

ANNABEL
—OR—
THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXVI.
AMONG THE INDIANS.
"I don't doubt it, to those who feel their influence," returned Philip. "But Jim and I are quite content to forego the pleasures so desired, and will be thankful to get back to our quiet and peaceful English life, which looks a great deal better in our present ominous situation. Eh, Jim?"

"Not a doubt on it, sir. Rochester has a queer sound in this forest of Kentucky," said Jim. "I have thought of it, Jim, and those dear to us there, will turn like women in the eyes of these savages, and that, Steve tells us, would never do."

"The worst thing possible," asserted Steve, very decidedly.
"Then courage, Jim, courage."
"And resignation, too, sir," said Jim. "With hope into the bargain," added the trapper, "for I ain't going to lose it till I'm actually scalped and killed. Then it will be about time, I calculate, to come to the belief that our fate is the worst as sure as snakes."

This conversation helped to beguile for a time from their depressing thoughts and if it did not much to give real brightness to their prospect, it gave them several degrees of strength which an exchange of ideas and feelings never fails to produce. The two Englishmen, especially, felt their bonds less galling and their hearts less heavy, as the long procession continued to trace the interminable forest paths, where the light was dimmed by the heavy foliage, and the air was hot and stifling for want of a penetrating breeze.

It was not, however, without a certain scorn and rebelliousness of feeling that they walked along in their bound condition. It was a condition degrading in itself, and rendered more so by the character of those under whose power they had to bow. Their masters were mere savages, infinitely beneath them in mind and soul, yet had they to trudge on by their side, disgraced and sickened by the long trailing hair of the scalp which dangled at their girdles coming into horrid proximity with their persons, till they shuddered with intense loathing.

For many hours the march was continued, but when the darkness of the forest was becoming darker from the shadows of gloaming they suddenly emerged on a large open space dotted with rows of conical huts, from the tops of which blue smoke ascended peacefully into the sultry air.

It was an Indian village, and at their appearance women and children, equalled and naked, came forward to meet them. The warriors, who lounged by the door of the huts or lay upon the grass under the trees, remained calm and passive, as became possessors of the forest Indian nature; but it could easily be noticed that the sight of the three white prisoners produced considerable excitement, and ere long the braves who had been lurking at home, while the others had been on the war path, collected in the hall where the captives were kept, and a general conference took place, which Steve knew had reference to himself and his companions. It was long and animated. Floods of eloquence were poured forth by each side, each delivering his oration with much reservation, and the council did not break up till long after night, and darkness required to be illuminated by pine torches, in whose lurid, blazing light the scene presented was brilliant and picturesque.

The captives waited with as much patience and calmness as they could command for the termination of a congress which they knew was to determine their fate. As before, they were the centre of a circle of enemies, but silent spectators, before whom they had to suppress all emotion and all signs of fear, and even uneasiness, a task of which the difficulty may be estimated when we consider not only the suspense under which they laboured, but the weakness to which they were reduced by hunger and fatigue. The council, being ended, food was brought and given to them. They did not examine too curiously its kind or quality, but ate it up voraciously even though it was placed in their mouths by the dirty hands of savages. When their meal was ended they were led a little distance from the village to where a row of trees stood by themselves in a straight line, their stems being only a few feet apart. Here there lower limbs were securely bound with cords, and each fastened to a tree, though in such a way that there was room for them to lie down to sleep. They were glad at least to lay their weary frames upon the ground, though to men in their position sleep might not be expected to come. Yet had Philip or Jim been inclined for it, their desires would have been effectually warded off by the injunction, emphatically given in a low voice by Steve—
"Don't Sleep."

Mr. E. E. Perrott's Lecture.

The above gentleman delivered a temperance lecture in the Good Templars' Hall, Guelph, last Monday evening, as announced. The audience was not large, but we think none present regretted their attendance. Mr. J. Ryan was appointed chairman, and after prayer by Rev. Mr. Howie, introduced the lecturer in a few appropriate remarks in which he noticed the present and past state of the temperance question. The lecturer on coming forward proceeded at once to the delivery of his lecture, and although a young man has an agreeable manner and fluency of speech, and was listened to with attention. He observed that the subject was not new, yet it was the master vice of the present age, and after noticing alcoholic liquor, in its component parts, its enlightening effect upon persons who use it, upon those who are connected with them, and upon what otherwise would be happy homes, exposed in a scathing manner the flimsy excuses of those who favor the use of intoxicating liquor. He then went on to show that it was a financial loss to the country, and a clog upon the system of political economy, and concluded his address by an urgent appeal to those present to use their utmost influence to rid the land of this great curse. A good lecture was taken up in all of the lecture fund, and a vote of thanks passed to the lecturer. Mr. Perrott then resided at the first inst. at Kingston on the 2nd, and will lecture at Merivale on the 3rd, at Douglas on the 4th, and in the old school house at Simpson's Corner, West Gara's, on the 5th inst. On Monday the 7th he lectures in Fergus, on the 8th in Elora, and on the 9th inst. at Ennerville.

After the meeting was dismissed Mr. Perrott informed those Good Templars who were present that Mr. T. W. Casey, of Niagara, G. W. Secretary for the Dominion, was willing to spend a week in this country, and would give a lecture at his wish. The wish was thankfully expressed in favor of his visiting Guelph.
