"It will bear a little more," he added, replacing it. "I wish you would go back," she began again, presently; "I'm quite comfortable, but you are not." "I think I have the better position," maintained Royden, coolly. "Your atmosphere has a mustiness about it nich I do not envy." Another pause. "De go!" exclaimed the girl, pettish-"Everybody will be wondering where you are, and there will be such "I like a fuss," said Royden, quietly; "Indeed I don't!" asserted Honore, in hot haste. "I cannot bear a fuss. What do you mean, Mr. Keith?" she asked, venturing forward a little in her den. 'What makes you say I like a fuss?" "I see you do." You are very unjust!" cried Honore, rousing herself into a state of wrath which she all the time knew to be ut-terly childish. "You say it fust because you want to be in the house. "I will," said Royden, calmly, "when I want to be in the house." You are quite wet," cried Honore, calming down a little, and feeling very small and powerless to impress him in any way with her own anger. Yes. Are you as wet?" "Oh, much wetter, of course. You have an overcoat; I had nothing over A look of anxiety, swift as thought, passed over Royden's face; but his next words were rather more leisurely even than they had been, and, therefore, of course, more successful. 'The others will be amused, Miss Craven, to see you in there. Mr. Haughton is coming toward us now. Don't stir yet. Capt. Trent is walking in this direction, too. Now you may enjoy the pleasure of a fuss." Without another word Honore stepped from the hollow tree-her blue cloak failing to hide the limp appearance of her dress and spoiled hat-and Royden coolly took his place beside 'How do you feel now?" he inquired, presently, glancing down upon her.

'Hungry, thank you." "I wish he hadn't come," she said to herself, petulantly. "I would rather anyone else had found me." Yet, when she joined them all, under a heavy fire of sympathy and astonishment and blame, she looked up into Royden's quiet, amused face, and-so variable is a woman's mind-wished come!" exclaimed Phoebe, ruefully.

"So am I," returned Honore, pleasantly, as she looked from Phoebe's carriage, and during the drive hardly showy dress down to her own wet gar- uttered a sentence, either to her moth-

"This sort of thing adds considerably to the expense of a picnic," observed Jane Haughton.

"Don't take any more notice, please, Jane," whispered the girl, in real and earnest entreaty, as she took her tea standing in her cloak; "my dress was not new; and I daresay it will wash."

"I don't want more," said Honore, shrinking from his touch. "Oh, Lawrence, how I do hate to be taken care of in this way," she added, as he hovered about her. "I like to be forgotten. It is such a relief to feel that nobody knows or cares anything about one." Not by very many was Honore the only one who, in impatient youth, has felt this strongly, because the care they received was not the care they loved. And they do not think that there may come a time when all such random words will sting with a keen, reproachful memory. "You shall have a dress of mine when we reach Deergrove, Honore," said Theodora, looking wth placidity on the girl's limp figure. "Oh, Mr. Keith, see how wet your hat is; it left quite a little pool when you took it up. That's through Honore—how vexatious!"

"Most vexatious," assented Royden, looking critically down upon the wet hat. "As an Englishman, this disaster touches me in a sensitive spot." "Are you really an Englishman?" in-quired Theodora, evidently glad of this vent for a little of her overnowing but suppressed curiosity.

"Is it not proved by my anxiety for my hat? Hat-worship belongs to no other nation. Don't you notice in England how a man's first and deepest care is always bestowed upon his hat?"
"Especially in church," added Mr. Haughton, flippantly. "Before he seats himself he breathes into it a prayer for its safety—and that's about the only time he looks really devout through "But, though you may be really an Englishman, Mr. Keith," persisted Miss Trent, "you must have been very much

"Yes. Don't you think, Miss Craven, that you hat is in as bad a plight as mine. It does not look nearly as tall as Miss Owen's now." "Phoebe thinks a hat cannot be too tall for her," remarked Mr. Haughton, "Very wise, Miss Phoebe," said Roy-the hole, 'if I'd had a low hat that bullet would have gone right through my head.' We should always choose tall hats, shouldn't we, Miss Owen?" No suspicion crossed the mind of anyone of his reasons for talking thus. "Honore," said Mrs. Payte, when the rain was over, and the carriages were coming around to the door in the gathering twilight, "take this large shawl of mine; I have wraps enough. You are coming with us in Mr. Kelth's dog-cart—you and Mr. Romer. Lady Somerson and Mrs. Romer are snug together in the Somerson carriage, and we go so fleetly behind those beautiful horses. And then," added the little lady, betraying her motive, "you can stop at the Larches and change your dress. "You dare not venture-eh?" inquired the little old lady, shrewdly, "Theodora says she will lend me a dress," amended the girl.

"Yes, so she will," remarked Mrs. Payte, dryly, "and a nice baggy old thing it will be. Don't I see how she is enjoying the idea of it, even now? She won't let you rival her tonight, be sure, child. Never mind, there's a beaut--'

"Mrs. Payte," put in Theodora, appearing at that moment, and graciously addressing the little old lady, of whose very existence she had all day endeavored to be unaware, "would you not like to change places with me for the drive to Deergrove? You will meet the wind in the seat you occupied in coming, whereas mine is a sheltered

"This is a thoughtful idea of yours, Miss Trent," returned the old lady, meditatively, "nevertheless, I like the seat I occupied in coming."

"Her exertions for my welfare are unselfish," observed Mrs. Payte, dry-ly, "and her motive inscrutable." "Miss Craven," said Royden, with er or to Hervey; her only consolation being the thought that, in the garb destined for her, Honore Craven would present a spectacle slightly at variance with the dainty figure which she had always mildly chafed to see about the rooms where she wished to reign, but which, since she had known Royden not new; and I daresay it will wash."

She turned and looked up into his face, surprised. "Of course it will be the last, Mr Romer. What other could there be?" "My dear," said the rector, in thoughtful tone, which told Honore that something had vexed him that day, "there will be tragedies enacted so long as jealousy and envy are allowed to be unbridled passions. Let us do our best to keep our hearts free from them." [To be Continued]
