'Probably not. You were concerned anly with taking your confederates' money and posing as the clever brain of the outift. But I imagine, and not another word shall I say, that they over-reached you a bit when they knifed Mr. Hunter."

Lamotte, to describe him by the name under which he figured in the annals of under which he figured in the annals o the crime, stretched out his hands in a gesture of emphatic protest.
"No matter what becomes of me," he said out of the country that

No matter what becomes of me, he said eagerly. "I ask you to believe that I did not even know they had killed Mr. Hunter until I saw the blood on the panel when I took them to Market street."
"So. You have been slow to adopt the lead I offered you. But why, in God's name, did they stab the man? That could hardly have been their deliberate.

'It was a sort of accident. So they He hesitated. He had given up hope for himself, but he stopped short of introducing other names into prominence. Until the Switzerland had reached

New York, with Count Ladislas Vassilan and the English lord on board."
Then Lamotte yielded. "You know everything," he said, with a dejected shrug. "Either you are a wizard, or Gregor and Rossi are openmouthed fools."

Steingall smiled inscrutably, but Clancy, who had remained strangely quiet, did not relax the close attention he was giving to the Frenchman's least word or action. to the Frenchman's least word or action it was about this time that Curtis noticed the little detective's air of complete absorption, and he wondered at it, since Clancy and his chief seemed to have unfolded the whole mystery in a way that was at once admirable and bewildering. "Then why don't you exercise your wits, man? I have been candor itself in wits, man? I have been candor itself in my statement, but it is your own words which will be taken down by the police captain here, as you are charged in his presence with complicity in the murder, and they will be on record for or against you when you are brought to trial."

"You want me to admit that what you have said is true?"

"Just as you wish," said Steingall, half contemptuously. "I now charge you formally with taking part in the murder of mally with taking part in the murder of the contemptuously. If you have anything to say Mr. Hunter. If you have anything to say, say it, and it will be written at once, and signed by you, if you choose."

He waited a moment, and then turned reide.

Put him in the cells," he said. "Put him in the cells," he said. "I shall not trouble farther about him now."
"One moment, monsieur," exclaimed Lamotte, evidently thinking that he was seriously jeopardizing his life by not taking the advice given so openly. "I admit that you are well informed, but I must add that I was ignorant of the murder till nearly half an hour after it had occurred."
"Pooh, that's no use! Make a full Pooh, that's no use! Make a ful Steingall's tone was so off-handed that Lamotte was afraid he had lost a good opportunity of saving his neck.

"But what is there to tell?" he cried.

"But what is there to tell?" he cried.

"Just what happened outside the Central Hotel and afterwards."

"I brought Mr. Hunter there, and modded to Martiny and Rossi, who were waiting on the sidewalk, to show that he was inside the car. I remained at the wheel, and anyone can perceive that my position made it impossible to see what was going on when the door opened. Martiny was nearest to me, and I am sure he never used a knife, so it must have been Rossi. Is that correct?"

"I believe so, absolutely. What next?"

"Martiny said 'Vite, allez!' so I shoved in the clutch and made off at top speed.

Then, to my annoyance, when I got down to help carry in Mr. Hunter, I found blood on the step and the panel, and the idiots told me what they had done. It is only fair to say that De Silva is innocent of any part in the affair. He didn't even know that we were bringing anyone to cossi's room, and we took care that he should be out at the time we counted on the striving at Market street."

"You didn't attack Mr. Hunter sooner

You didn't attack Mr. Hunter sooner ause your orders were to wait until last possible moment?" "That is so."

Devai was unaware of any change in he manner of either of the detectives, because he was watching Lamotte's livid face with a species of fascinated horror, but Curtis, who had often been compelled to hold similar inquiries into cold-blooded crimes committed by Chinese coolies, found greater interest in observing Clancy. A subtle exultation had suddenly Clancy. A subtle exultation had suddenly danced into the diminutive Franco-Irishman's expressive features when Market street was first mentioned, and his coalblack eyes blazed in their slits at the sound of that name, De Silva.

A queer thought flitted through Curtis's mind, but he put it aside, because Steingall was speaking again.

"Well, you got rid of your friends. Then what did you do?"

"The rest was simple. I cleaned the car in a hurry with a bit of oily waste, took it to a yard which I have used at times, at an address which I beg you to took it to a yard which I have used at times, at an address which I beg you to permit me to forget, changed the number plate, and at an hour which I deemed discreet, drove uptown in order to dispose of the car by leaving it deserted near the garage from which it came. The owner's house is on Riverside Drive. His name is Morris; he is absent in Chicago on business, while I learned that his chauffeur was ill."

A gasp of uncontrollable excitement

A gasp of uncontrollable excitement from Devar drew all eyes ot him.

steingall swept the matter aside impatiently.

"Go on," he said to the Frenchman.

"You're taking a note of this?" he added, glancing at Police Captain Evans.

"Got it," was the laconic reply.

"There is nothing else," said Lamotte.

"I noticed that I was being followed, and soon discovered that I could not shake off a more powerful car. I was armed, but did not want to get into trouble on my own account, and I knew that I would own account, and I knew that I would have to deal with three men. So I decided to throw the car in the river, and trust to my wits for a means of escape. I would have succeeded, too, had I been aware that there was a fourth man in the party. Perhaps it is as well, because I meant to get away, and would have fought. That is all. Will one of you give me a cigarette?"

Devar produced a case, and in response to Steingall's nod, offered its con-cents to the prisoner, who took two digarettes; nor could he be prevailed on to accept more. Despite his hangdog looks yet some streak of a nobler heredity had ruggled to exert its influence, only to London, July 7.—Queen Mary has given another example of the strictness of her views on propriety. At the same time she has shown that she is not prejudiced and is perfectly open to conviction if her views are atisfactorily proved to be erroneous.
