Handing it over to reform or agricultural associations will neither please nor deceive the taxpayers. Scotland is nothing if not Sabbatarian. Few would think of looking in a Scottish newspaper for a defence of Sunday cars, yet such we find in an influential journal, the Glasgow Herald. An attempt was recently made to induce the Glasgow tramway company to stop the Sunday service of their line, but the request was peremptorily refused, and the Herald stoutly upholds the company's policy. Briefly stated, the position taken is that the liberal use made of the cars upon Sunday by church goers and others is evidence of their necessity, and that those dence of their necessity, and that those at their mouths. That the business of a large city cannot be carried on without more or less Sunday labor is a self-evident proposition. Many sticklers for strict Sabbath observance know this to be the fact, and are obliged to recognige it in their own affairs. In the very matter of church-going there is often involved a certain amount of labor to man and beast, and especially among the wealthier classes. Poorer people, residing at considerable distances from their places of worship, must either take all the risks of fatigue and bad weather, or remain at home during church hour. That is a very fine distinction which is drawn between the labor of the rich man's coachman and the poor man's cardriver.
