Wellington and Front-streets East,

FREDDY'S LETTER TO PAPA.

It Was Interesting, but Not Just

There is a bright little boy of ten on the south side whose papa is a life in-surance agent. Life insurance agents, probably known, are early risers as it is a tradition in the business that it is the agent who comes early and stays late—that is to say, camps out with his intended victim,—who gets the policy. Freddy was nearly always asleen when his father left for the city it the morning, so his papa got into the way of writing little notes of farewell and leaving them for delivery when he woke up. Freddy didn't answer these notes, although repeatedly urged to do so, because, in spite of the fact that he is a bright little boy—as will trans-pire—he is not, to use the current vernacular, "stuck on himself." and could never summon up courage to try his lead pencil at this style of composition.

The other evening, however, the necessary inspiration came. His papa was called out on business and mamma wanted to go with him. She thought he could write the policy better if she was with him. He thought he couldn't, and said so bluntly. He went away alone, but his wife knew where was going and joined him later, as both were well acquainted with the people to whom he had gone. He has a bluff way of speaking, and what he said was not taken at face value by his wife, as the sequel showed.

Freddy, however, who hadn't known papa as long as mamma, had thought the matter over for a long half hour and then decided that the time had come for him to reply to the numerous communications that he received. When papa and mamma returned he was fast asleep, but they found the following note, written in a little boy's sprawl ng hand, fastened to the pillow on the side where papa always sleeps:
"My Dear Papa; I have been want ing to answer your letter, but the way you talked to mamma at the dinner table to-night made me write at once. You know very well Pana that you're in (the) wrong and I want you (to) promise me that you will not do it again. If you think it is nice to talk that way to mamma I don't. You The cost of The cost of should be good to mamma as she has been to us always and I think you ought to beg mamma's pardon to-morrow morning before you go, these are the things I want you to promise me:
