

RED OR BLUE?

SCHOOLS that teach a hundred or more different subjects sometimes refer to their "methods," as if it were possible for any one school to devise "methods" for a hundred different subjects. To write a method requires inventive genius, patience, perseverance, and an abundance of time. It took nearly ten years to write the DEBRISAY Latin Method, and our Method for French took nearly as long. Of course if you mean by "method" the use of a blue pencil instead of a red one in making corrections, or some such trifling innovation as this, then we concede it is possible to have original "methods" of teaching everything under the sun. What we understand by a "method" is a well-thought-out plan—something on the lines of the propositions of Euclid, that leads step by step to the mastery of a subject. How many methods did Euclid write? Only one. But it has survived; a hundred would have perished.
