

Since he must do what parliament and its leader desire, he is never blamed if a mistake is made. Consequently, there is at the head of the nation a person who is regarded as above and beyond all the fierce struggle of politics. If the nation is dissatisfied, it blames only the leader of the government and those who support him in parliament.

Sometimes, however, our governor-general, when a bill is sent to him after it has passed the two Houses, may say that he does not give the king's assent to it, but reserves it for the king's decision, that is, of course, for the decision of the government of Great Britain. The governor-general will never reserve a bill, unless he has a good reason for so doing, such as, believing that it will be hurtful to the Empire as a whole, that it is contrary to treaties with foreign nations, or that it is beyond the right of our parliament to pass. Two years are allowed for the British government to consider whether the king's assent shall be given to a bill reserved in this way. If it is given, the bill becomes law, but, if not, the bill does not become law.
