Under these circumstances it seems difficult to realize that the citizens of London twenty-five years ago were far from enthusiastic about the formation of the society and that the inaugural meeting was a very small one.

Interesting Account.

A detailed account of this interesting event is contained in a copy of The society.

It is the chief local news in that edition, and under the heading "Friendless Children," says:

"There was not a very large attendance at the meeting in the city council chamber last evening, which had been called by the mayor to consider the advisability of forming a Children's Ald Society in London. The enthusiasm and interest were not, however, hidden under a bushel, and after Mr. Kelso had explained the act affecting the matter and some discussion had taken place, the meeting affirmed its belief in the necessity of such an organization. A committee was then appointed to de
