Captured Orders Show Germans Knew of Impending Assault.

London, June 14.—Discussing the British method of attack at Messines.

German suitaining every thing we set out to get in this battle is more striking because the German survey and tack was impending. I have just secured some German orders which were taken from prisoners, and these orders show that the Germans were cognizant of the fact that an attack was about to be made. "One order, dated May II, gives the probable time of the British attack, stating that it would take place between June 3 and 9. Another orders stated that the Messines-Woshoate ridge would be the objective, and pointed out to the German troops inding this section that this position was important and must not be given be method in the British practice of swooping down low me with their airplanes, over the German trong many from the best color of the British practice of swooping down low me with their airplanes, over the German trenches, must be stopped by machine gunners. British method of attack at Messines, Major-General Maurice, at the war office, said the impression had got about that the success in this assault was due to the great mine explosions, but that this was a false idea.

"Our real success was due to the arrangement of our artillery fire and the superiority of our artillery fire and the superiority in turn, was due, mainly to our superiority in the air service which directs the artillery.

"The million pounds of explosives set off certainly was an aid in the attack, since it caused a panic among the Germans and permitted our men to get thru more easily. But our mines were under the German front line trenches, which were not held strongly, so I believe the explosions caused only a small proportion of the casualties which the Germans surfered.
