IDAHO'S GREAT TRIAL

(Collier's Weekly.)

One of the great state trials of American history began at Boise, Idaho, on May 9, when William D. Haywood, secretary and treasurer of the Western Federation of Miners, was arraigned for the murder of ex-Governor Frank Steunenberg. All the circumstances of the case were extraordinary. The crime was of a peculiar atrocity, and Russian rather than American in its character. Mr. Steunenberg was killed by a bomb at his own gate, six years after he had ceased to have any active connection with the troubles that were assigned as the cause of his murder. Haywood and his co-defendants, Moyer and Pettibone, were not in Idaho when the crime was committed. They were connected with it by the confession of the alleged principal, and were brought from Colorado by a proceeding described by their friends as a legal kidnapping.

But what gives this trial its chief significance is not the personalities of the actors in it, but the fact that hundreds of thousands of men and women, not only in the United States but all over the world, have worked themselves into the belief that it is not an ordinary criminal proceeding, but a pitched battle between capital and labor. They think that Haywood, Moyer, and Pettibone have been marked for destruction as a means of destroying the Western Federation of Miners, and that all the powers of government are being unscrupulously used to that end. This belief has been assiduously propagated through one of the most energetic missionary crusades of modern times, and through tireless appeals to the class spirit of working men and women, who have been put in possession of a campaign fund that puts them on an equality with Thaw or any other millionaire who has had to fight for his life or liberty in the dock.

President Roosevelt's incautious reference to Moyer and Haywood as "undesirable citizens," which he subsequently defended and elaborated in his letter to Mr. Jaxon of Chicago, enraged the more radical followers of the prisoners, and demonstrations were organized to express the Socialist opinion of him. In New York there was a procession on May 4, in which a number variously estimated at from twenty to seventy thousand men and women, wearing buttons inscribed: "We are undesirable citizens," marched under the flag to a hall where as many of them as could get in listened to inflammatory speeches denouncing the president. But the effort to array organized labor solidly against Mr. Roosevelt failed. A delegation of three members of the Central Federation of Union of New York visited the White House to remonstrate with the president. It was cordially received and the president showed the members a letter which he had written to the attorney-general over a year before directing him to investigate the charge that Moyer and Haywood had been kidnapped, and to do everything in the power of the federal authorities to assist in securing justice to both sides. In this he had said:

"So far as the unions are anxious only to see that exact justice is done these men, that they are given their full legal rights, and not condemned unless proved guilty of this specific act, they are entitled to the cordial cooperation of all just and fair-minded citizens. So far as by any action, or by murderous and treasonable language, such as that quoted above from Debs (and others), they tend to bring pressure to bear upon the state authorities and the courts to obstruct the course of justice and to render it difficult to convict the men, if guilty, they are equally without right to be condemned; and anything that the federal authorities can do in either event to further the cause of justice is to be done."

He gave the committee a written assurance that this would continue to be his policy, and that if any evidence should be submitted to him at any time showing any injustice either for or against the prisoners he would do anything in his power to redress it. The committee returned to New York full of satisfaction.

(N. Y. American, May 18.)
The coroner's jury called by Coroner Artelt to inquire into the death of Mrs. Corinne McBride, from pneumonia, at the Varona No. 25 West Eighteenth street, while under Christian Science treatment, yesterday censured the husband of the dead woman for refusing to summon medical aid when his wife was dying. They censured as well Mrs. Anna C. for him to summon an officer to have her taken out and arrested.
Margaret Duncan, a frail young woman, who was in charge of the case of Mrs. McBride took the stand. She said she was a Christian Science practitioner. Asked her process of treating disease, she said: "It is to administer spiritual help that will destroy the effects of the disease. The practice consists in prayer to God as the Giver of all good as taught in the Bible. It is mental; but Christian Science recognizes that material conditions must be observed. If a patient has pneumonia, we call it pneumonia; if fever, we call it fever."
"But," said the coroner, "how do you know what it is? Is it not possible to make a mistake, not knowing anything of medicine?"
"Well, common sense would tell any body whether a person had a chill or a fever," was the reply.
By further questioning the contentions of the healer were brought forth. She said Mrs. McBride had not died from pneumonia, but that her death was really brought about by the shock to her faith and her spiritual beliefs. Mrs. Chisam had questioned her faith by asking that a man of medicine be called.
"Why did you summon Mrs. Batty?" asked one of the jurors.
"Why," said the healer, "it seemed that she was dying and we wanted a physician."
