It seems to me that every man and woman who has is the better for it.

Do I fail to make myself plain? I simply mean that everyone should have, besides an ideal of accomplishment, an embodied ideal in the shape of some human being whom he would like to resemble.

Admiration is the healthiest of human sentiments. Every strong admiration we feel for something good and fine lifts us a step nearer the infinite.

The man who can seldom see anything in his fellow men to admire may know that he is probably at an intellectual and moral standstill.

It is the man who is continually looking up who usually gets up, not the man who doesn't believe there is anything up there worth looking at.

Now to admire character and ability in a general way is an excellent stimulant, but to focus one's admiration on some definite personality is to give this lever of admiration a vastly greater lifting power. A Cure "Lakelet, Ont., May 12th, 1910.

If possible, select someone you not only admire, but for whom you have at least a touch of intellectual affinity—that is, someone whom you fancy you might have been congenial with and might even have been a bit like if the gods had seen fit to make you of the great men.
