The American War.—The American war has fairly assumed the proportions of the national continuity of all of the country, and at the public dinner tables of the great agricultural ord political dinner tables of the great agricultural and political dinner tables of the great agricultural and political dinner tables of the great agricultural and political associations. From these effusions we gather that both the executive, the legislators, the lawyers and the commercial men of the United Kingdom have made up their minds to the conviction—unpleasant or disagreeable as it may be to many of them—that the "federal blockade of the rebel ports must be respected." Earl Russell officially intimates this in a letter to a Liverpool gentleman. The Recorder of Birminghum—an eminent legal authority—repeated the same opinion at the very moment when he proclaimed his entire sympathy with the cause of the rebels. He says;

"With respect to the right of six millions of people, forming part of a number of States, constituted as were the United States of America, to seceed, the learned recorder said:—The declaration of their will to do so carried with it is own justification. To talk of rebellion and treason, was to repeat the folly of our own Government against those very Northern States who were now using the same language which they then repelled. Where, he asked, was the tribunal before which to bring six millions of free people—where the dock large enough to hold them, the jury intelligent enough to sit as their judge? The Reign of King Cotton at an End.— American cotton is actually out of the field for the moment, and there is no saying how long it may centinue so. Competition is free to al, and there will be room during this unexpected opportunity for the improvement of the article up to the requisite standard. When America appears in the market egain India ought to be her match; and, if this can be accomplished, England will be relieved from any risk of another cotton drought, while India will be enriched by a trade of many millions a year.—London spirit of the Journal des Debats since the Comic de Paris and the Duc de Chartres have enrolled themselves as volunteers in the army of the federale. "Look on this picture and look on that," it says, as it spreads out two columns—the one dated September 28. and the other October 21—on American affairs. "A month ago the government of Washington was simply repenting the blunder of George the Third. It is now, with a powerful arm and determined will, enforcing the indisputable rights of freedom and the sacred laws of popular government."

Now why should the Constitutione—whose opinions on every subject have boxed the compass, who only recently, in the matter of the Anglo-French treaty, "jumped Jim Crow," to the great amusement of all its contemporaries—take this special opportunity of drilling the Debats? I am afraid the answer can only be such as corroborates what I hinted in my last as the consequence of Prince Napoleon's visit to the United States—namely, that France is only too ready to acknowledge the rebel States whenever a decent opportunity is affirded."
