CAPTAIN HAGGARD ler, and Brother of the Talks to the Sun About the New Brunswick Transvaal Contingent

the Empire.

Capt. Haggard, who has been in St. John for some days past, has an especial interest in African affairs. He has himself campaigned on the Nile but it is in South Africa he is chiefly interested, for the reason that no less than three of his brothers have sojourned there at different times and for considerable periods.

A BIT OF HISTORY. It will interest the Sun's readers to know that it was one of these brothers, Rider Haggard, the famous novelist, who, with his own hand in 1877 hoisted in Pretoria the British flag that proclaimed to the world the annexation of the Transvaal to the weeks previously Rider Haggard had been serving as private secretary to Sir Henry Bulwer, high commis in South Africa, and was invited by pany him on his dangerous mission to the Transvaal. This mission, as the student of history remembers, owing to the threatening attitude of the Zulus and the bankruptcy of the Boer government, resulted in the annexation of the country to the British crown, and Mr. Haggard hoisted the stant registrar of the high court of the Transvaal, and was much asso clated with Chief Justice Kotze, who was dismissed by President Kruger about eighteen months ago in conse-quence of his refusal to admit that the Raad should have power to subvert the grondwet or constitution Chief Justice Kotze was dismis with the result, as we know, of the utter impossibility of the Uitlander obtaining any measure of justice what-Rider Haggard took up a farm named Hilldrop, near Newcastle, and on the border of Natal and the Transvaal. It was in this house, Captain Haggard thinks, that the draft of the convention was signed after the disaster at Majuba Hill. At all events the Eritish signatories were quartered at Hilldrop. Thus Rider Haggard saw both the rise and the temporary fall of British power in the Transvaal. More than that, he was financially a loser, for it was impossible for him and his wife to remain in occupation of the farm after the signing of the convention, in consequence of the bullying and insolent manner of the

BECAME A NOVELIST. It was because of this that Rider Haggard returned to Er gland, to come a barrister and eventually a famous writer. In his works his per-sonal knowledge of African affairs was of great advantage. But his first book was not a novel. It was entitled Cetewayo and His White Neighbors, and dealt fully with the situation of affairs at that time. His novels The Witch's Heaff and Jess are of particular interest in connection with the Transvaal and South Africa. His latest book, Swallow, published last spring, treats of the old Boers and their first great "trek," in early part of the century; and delineates the Boer character much as it can be traced today in Kruger and his compatriots.

Boers in that vicinity

Another brother, Col. Andrew Haggard, is well known in Canada as a sportsman and as a contributor The Field. He has hunted game in many parts of Canada, has also seen military service, and has written books. One of these, Under the Crescent and Star, deals with the earlier Nile campaigns, and is a very interesting work.

CAPT. HAGGARD'S CAREER. Capt. Haggard himself, though a young man, has seen active service. He was an officer in the 53rd Shropshire Light Infantry, and later in the transport service, but retired, and is now on half pay. There is a possibility of his offering his services in the Transvaal war. He served in the Suakim campaign in the Soudan, under Sir Gerald Graham, in 1885, and his regiment participated in repelling night attacks, the march to Tamai, and all through the campaign. They were for two years at Suakim, the worst place, Capt. Haggard says, an army ever was quartered in. It is now occupied by an Egyptian force. During his stay there he saw a good deal of "roughing it," in the hottest climate in the world, and also saw of what stuff the Britsh soldier is made, and what he can do under the most trying circumstances. Of 865 men in his regiment. over 400 were lost-killed, died from sickness or were invalided. They were men, too, who had seen service in 1882 against Arabi Pasha, and won the medal and star, which Capt. Haggard

The captain is likewise a literary man, and under the nom de plume of Arthur Amyand has contributed stories of military life and published three books, two of which went through two editions. The books are: Only a Drummer Boy; With Rank and File, or Side Lights on Soldier Life; and Comrades in Arms, a story of the Egyptian campaign of 1885. In these books Capt. Haggard's aim has always been to depict faithfully the inner life of the British soldier in its true colors. He has not written any for two or three years, but hopes to take up the work again some time in the future.

THE N. B. CONTINGENT. Capt. Haggard, at the Dufferin hotel on Thrusday, spoke in the most en-thusiastic way about the New Brunswick contingent for the Transvaal. It was his good fortune, he said, to be in Fredericton on Monday and to witners the farewell proceedings at the City hall. He was struck by the appes rance of the detachment from that town, which was chiefly composed of

C. I. men. He thought, as he at these men (who he had seen service in the and fit, and a trained regiment of interview. eir appearance would be a great acuisition to any army.

With regard to the contingent that vent from St. John on Wednesday, so ar as he was able to offer an opinion. he considered it to be of splendid ma-The First British Flag in Pretoria - Mile drill, and their appearance in the parade, it was evident that they possessed every qualification to make them, with training, every bit as good as the men of the R. R. C. I. already aluded to. The members of the militia he believed had already gone through a considerable amount of drill, and there could be little doubt of their attaining in a very short time a high standard of efficiency. He had no hesitati m in saying that they would, when called upon, be able to take their part and share the dangers of a campaign, and not suffer from any comparison with their English comrades. If the whole of the Canadian contingent was composed of men like these, he felt safe in saving that the purely English Tommy Atkins would, on seeing them, feel proud to welcome them as comrades, and literally as brothers from across the sea. struck him, however, as the men or rife practice, they should be teriod of drill before they were to the front. But if that should prove to be impossible, he did not doubt that their power of endurance and their intelligence would compens some considerable degree for any lack in that respect. For it was evident to him that they were above the average in intelligence.

With regard to what the Canadians may have before them it was impos-sible to foretell. Whatever happens, mould they go up the country merely o garrison Pretoria or other towns the Transvaal and Orange Free State, neither they nor those at home must close their eyes to the fact that they will have many hardships to endure The climate of the country is excellent, but compaigning even under the most favorable circumstances must necessarily be arduous. It is impossible, said Capt. Haggard, for English soldier who, in the past, has learned from personal experience what has to be endured, not to admire the public spirit and self-sacrifice which as been exhibited in the ready reponse to the call for the cause of the mpire, and the loyal feeling and the ortitude of those nearest and dearest at home, who have in so many cases urged their own to go. The event marks an era in the history of Canada and the empire. Canada may think she owes Britain a debt of gratitude for protection in the past, but Britain will feel deeply how the debt is now esing repaid, and the loyal action of Canada and the other colonies must surely tend to the clinching of the bonds of imperial unity to which every true Englishman now looks forward. For it surely cannot be that the true mission in the world of the English speaking race can be brought to its fulfilment should England and her bound together.

Capt. Haggard feels it to have be a great privilege to have been in the city of the loyalists and to have seen the demonstration on Wednesday when the N. B. contingent departed. He expected to leave for New York this morning, and desired to say that the great kindness with which he had been treated by the citizens whom he had met would remain with him always a delightful memory.

INCREASE OF SCOTCH LUNATICS. Disease Develops Principally Among the Farming Population.

(Edinburgh Cor. Chicago Record.)
The report of the general board of lunacy for Scotland tells of a steady rise of lunacy in the country. There were under the care of the board January 1 last 15,399 lunatics—7,233 males and 8,165 females—an increase in one year of 487. The increase of mental diseases in civilized countries is often attributed to the strain and stress of modern life, a deduction which might rightly be applied to large urban centres, but which, it might be expected, would not so readily fit the conditions of country life.

Oddly enough, it is not in great centres of population in Scotland that the largest increase has occurred, but in so remote a country as Argyle, where the railway as yet has hardly penetrated. The reason will ressibly be found in the fact that Argyle has a great many poor people, and poverty and lunacy often go hand in hand. (Edinburgh Cor. Chicago Record.)

Farmer Fahnstock thinks he owns the stock he is so proud of. But as a matter of fact the stock owns him. He is the humble servant of horse, cow and pig. He looks after them better than he looks after himself, and feeds them before he feeds himself, and feeds them before he feeds himself. That is why it so often happens that just about the time that Farmer Fahnstock has reached the place reached the place where he can take things easy, he breaks down. From Barberton I went to Standerton, Newcastle, Pietermaritzberg and Durban. I have been once alone around the country on this trip, and once was accompanied by my wife and child, then ten

A HEALTHY COUNTRY. "We found the climate exceptionally good, the difference in temperature from day to day being very slight. In the Transvaal the hottest summer day did not exceed 90 degrees Fahrenheit, and I do remember anything under degrees in the coldest winter weather. I was rather surprised to hear that among some of the people of St. John the Transvaal was regarded as an unhealthy country. I have been pretty well over the world, inbluding South America, the United States, Mexico, Africa, India and Aug. lia, and I do not hesitate that all the portions of the Transvaal through which I passed were regarded as exceptionally healthy. Our little boy thrived wonderfully, and we never had a moment's illness during our two years there. I suppose the idea that it is unhealthy has arisen from the fact that in the early days of Johannesberg it was a "tinpot" town, with no sanitary arrangements of any kind. or municipal authority. There was a rush of thirty thousand people, who settled down in tents and houses built of galvanized iron, with to sanitary precautions or arrangements, and as a cons several bad outbreaks of typhoid fever occurred. I do not know the death rate in Johannesberg today, but am perfectly certain the place would compare favorably as to healthfulness with any mining town in the world.

OOM PAUL KRUGER. "I had the pleasure of meeting Oom Paul Kruger personally, and though I minister the government of the country, since the influx of such an enormous white mixed population, I cannot deny that he has many remarkable traits and is in many ways a striking character. He works very hard, and is a man of tremendous will power, which, unfortu-nately, is allied with great obstinacy and pig-headedness. To the latter I attribute the present position of affairs. I think his native judgment would have led him to avoid the present crisis, but he has been influenced and advised by certain Dutch and German houses, who have been sucking the blood of the gold mining industry for years.

BADLY ADVISED. Up to the time of the Jameson raid. and the crisis which followed, it must admitted that he had acted with great astuteness and dis lowly his advisers worked on his feelings and made him suspect the complicity of Mr. Chamberlain in that affair; and in this way a deep rooted anti-pathy to England, which already existed, but which was concealed by his astute diplomacy, was fostered till it burst the bounds of self-control. could give one instance from personal knowledge to show how this worked out. A German friend of mine represented parties interested in dynamite mononoply. They were making enormous sums out of the usurious terms imposed. My friend was summoned from London to give evidence at the enquiry before the Champer of Mines. He told me, before he left London, that there would be no abolition of the dynamite monopoly, and that he was going back with positive instructions to put the price still higher, and thus show the agitators that not only would Kruger ignore their grievances, but would make their burder.s harder. This programme, however, was not carried out.

THE JAMESON BAID.

"When the Jameson raid broke out: hree-fourths of the world appeared to be astounded at a movement of which nothing apporently was known. But as a matter of fact, as far back as 1890 arms were being imported and men secretly drilled, to my personal knowledge, and one of the managers of my firm's mines in Africa had been requested by one of the noted reform leaders to organize and ultimately to lead a rebellion against Boer suthority. The movement collapsed as it was hoped that constitutional means would secure the end in view but the dissatisfaction existed then. As to the Jameson raid, few people know how near that movement came to being successful. A little more precaution, a little more delay, and the arsenal at Pretoria, guarded by only a few men, would have fallen to a band of fifty. There was no other centre of supply for ammunition in the whole of the Transvaal, and country was utterly unprepared for the contingency.

"Speaking from personal knowledge, have been consistent for years on this point, namely, that neither by arbitration not concessions, nor by any show of magnanimity could Great Britain have avoided the present trouble Gladstone's mistake was a fatal one. and all the efforts of diplomacy were baffled by the astuteness and lack of honor among the Boer officials. It was of no use taking their word or promise for anything.

A LOST OPPORTUNITY. "At the time of the Jameson raid there was an opportunity which was clearly seen by Cecil Rhodes, the em-pire builder, and some others, but of ourse it was none of their business, and never should have been. But then was the time when a well laid plan, backed, as I claim it should have been, by the imperial government, would have settled forever the Transvaal problem. Ten thousand men would easily have done it, and probably less; and I don't think it would have cost five hundred lives; for, as I said before, the Transvaal was quite unprepared.

ba Hill, and in this campaign will avenge themselves for their brothers who were slaughtered there. I do not think the Transvaal and Orange Free State have together over 40,000 men, and of these not over 20,000 to 25,000 have ever been trained in military

"As to racial feeling between Boers and British, it was the policy of the nation rather than individual feeling that developed the race hatred which is admitted to exist now. "As Mr. Chamberlain said, our magnanimity in 1881 produced only one effect on the ignorant Boer population. It made them think lightly the prestige and fighting power of the British nation. There was but one way to regain that prestige, and in my opinion no other policy than that pur med by Chamberlain was possible Personally, while negotiations were pending, I dreaded lest some European complication should have enabled Kruge: to back down from his position without giving adequate redress to the Outlanders' grievances, and thus make still harder the retention of British supremacy in South Africa. If Krager could only have been wise in time he would have seen that the acceptance of Sir Alfred Milner's proposals would have assured the inde ndence of the Transvaal forever franchise would have been acreat mistakes that have been made in olonial policy by directing details from Downing street, and who would have voted for an absolutely independent Transvaal subject only to a proper definition of her majesty's suzerainty. Today there is no question of that. The result of the war must inevitably mean the annexation of the Transvaal and Orange Free State by Great Britain, and probably the formation of a Dominion of South Africa, under a governor general representing the queen, with internal affairs regulated by a provincial legislature.

THE CANADIAN CONTINGENT. "I have been delighted to hear on every side in Canada such expressions of loyalty to the empire. While it was nothing more expected from Anglo-Canadians, just say that my travels in the United States had prepared me to mistrust somewhat the disposition of the French-Canadian element. On this point, however, my mind has been disabused, having heard the feelings consider him entirely unfitted to ad- of the Quebec people voiced by Mr. Bergeron and having read in the press such firm expressions of loyalty.

"There is one phase of the subjec arising out of the present situation that has not, it seems to me, received the attention it deserves. I mean the opportunity afforded by the sending out to South Africa of a regiment of men who are the pick of the Canadian militia. Their going affords them an opportunity which they do not at present fully appreciate. Their offer of by feelings of patriotism and lovalty to the empire: but I fully believe every Canadian who goes and cares to stay in South Africa after the war is over (and I think the end is even now in sight) will get such a cordial reception and be given such opportunities of advancement in mining or commercial business that he will be well repaid, and learn that loyalty there as here is more than a mere sentiment. They will firmly believe, the opportunity of lifetime to make a start in that vast country to the north of the Transvaal -Rhodesia, Matabeleland and Mash onaland - waiting to be settled and I believe any clever Canadian who applies to Cecil Rhodes will be able to get a position in that crthern country where he will be a pioneer with opportunities to make his fortune. In fact, to attempt to explain the great opportunities awaiting intelligent enterprise there would require much more space than the Sun could afford to place at my disposal." "I have spoken for the moment of the country north of the Transvaal because that is where you Canadian contingent, who are born pioneers will find the best scope for their energy. There will, however, be another opportunity, namely, the settlement new conditions of that wealths tract of land now known as the Trans vaal and Orange Free State, names scon to be blotted from the face of the map. The diamond mines, mineral re sources and agricultural wealth of the Orange Free State have never yet been attempted to be exploited by any serius combination of capitalists.

Prince's Farewell to Sir Redvers Buller.

Stirring Scenes at Waterloo Station and at Southampton.

LONDON, Oct. 16.-For the second time within the week, Waterloo station was, on Saturday, the scene of a nstration of popular enthugreat dem iasm, of which the hero was General the Right Hon. Sir Redvers H. Buller V. C. who left to take command of the British army in South Africa.

It was a scene in which comp and ceremony found no place, in which there was no brilliancy of color, no proud display of martial strength or of imperial power, but a scene which the absence of all attempt at stagement rendered the more hu manly impressive.

It was a popular send-off, if there has ever been one. Last Tuesday's arewell to the Australian Lancers faded from memory in presence of the eager thousands who congested Waterloc station and the streets around it in the hope of catching a glimpse of Sir Redvers Buller and of giving him a ringing British cheer. They saw who witnessed that scene of excitement, and heard the great shout of welcome and then of farewell, will forget for many a day Sir Redvers Buller's leave-taking, or doubt that the official choice of general to command our forces in South Africa is popularly approved.

The public determination to make the occasion worthy of the brilliant, resolute soldier who was going to the front undoubtedly was strengthened by the krowledge that

ROYAL PERSONAGES would be among the last to say Godpeed, and offer a last wish of good uck to Sir Redvers and the officers of his staff. So Waterloo station filled up a couple of hours before the general was due to leave, and even the railway folk admitted that so many thousand people had never squeezed themselves into the space before. Outside, the streets were full to overflowing, and the surplus disposed tself on housetops and at windows. The only open space in the whole area was the Southampton departure platform, which was rigorously railed off, and there, too, a crowd began drew near—a crowd of privileged and distinguished persons, whose arrivals roused rounds of preliminary cheers. The Marquis of Lansdowne, secretary for war, accompanied by Lady Lansowne, George Wyndham, M. P., his able lieutenant; Lord Wolseley, comnander-in-chief; Sir Evelyn Wood, Powell Williams, financial secretary to the war office; Lord Ampthill, Mr. Chamberlain's chief private secretary; the Duke of Abercorn, the Marquis of Granby, Lords Loch, Rowton, Halifax, Methuen, Falmouth, Pirtright, General Trotter, General Lane, General Williams, General Marshall, General Clarke, Major-General Sir John Ardigh, Sir Henry Brackenbury, General C. Grove, General Godfrey Clarke, deneral Olpherts, the Hon. Maurice Gifford, Sir Howard Vincent, and many another, made up the farewell the necessary order of admiss party. Outside was many a distinguished officer and civilian, without Ehortly before two o'cock the thunder of cheers rolled up into the station. Every hat waved in the air and every man shouted his loudest, as from a carriage there stepped Sir Redvers Buller, V. C., in long, heavy overcoat and plain felt box-hat, accompanied by Lady Buller and her daughters and Lady St. Levan. The figure was that of an elderly country squire, but as Sir Redvers turned with dignified deliberation and raised his hat in acknowledgment of the ovation the features of the soldierly face showed the real man-features as strong as steel, token of a brave and resolute spirit, an inflexible will. But the stern face smiled as the crowd roared again, "Good old Buller-hooray, Buller-Buller, Buller-hooray, good old Buller!" It was A MAGNIFICENT PICTURE, the grim, stolid warrior, facing the broadsides of cheers from the crowd. A few minutes passed, during which Sir Redvers shook hands warmly with old friends, and then another outb ushered in the royal carriages, and the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge appeared. They received an immense greeting. Only a few minutes remained, and the prince and the general gripped hands for several mo-ments. "Good-bye, Buller, and good luck to you," said the prince, while the old duke clapped his hands on the commander's shoulder and whispered his last advice and farewell. Everybody shook Sir Redvers's hand, the people outside cheered and sang

"God Save the Queen."
Then Sir Redvers moved towards his saloon, and the prince shook hands again, saying, "Good-bye, again Buller, and good luck." The silk hats rose in the air, the roar outside redoubled, and Fir Redvers had gone.

But moving as was the scene

Waterloo, it was perhaps eclipsed by the final farewell which was taken of the general by British men and women as the Dunottar Castle left Souths ton quay. The fine ship was crowde with soldiers, civilians, women, and children. Forward were ninety men of the ranks, and half a dozen chargers, including Ironmonger and Biffin, the general's own. The decks swarmed with officers in mufti waving to friends below, perhaps, a last farewell. Women with bright eyes, from which the tears could barely be suppressed, er Long wharf crib.

rooped off as the siren hooted Then a loud cheer arose from the housands on the quay as Sir Redvers and his staff officers, in their staff caps, stepped from the special train and went aboard. Again the imperturbable soldier smiled faintly as

THE CHEERS RANG OUT. Admiral Sir Michael Cuime-Seymour, General Sir Baker Russell, General Dacre, Major General Stewart, Colonel Creagh, Colonel Stackpole, and other staff officers in uniform, and the mayor of Southampton greeted Sir Redvers. who walked arm in arm with the mayor up the gangway on to the ship. The general shook hands with Commander Rigby, of the Dunottar Castle, in front of the biograph machine which to record the campaign, and then disappeared for a while.

A quarter of an hour more and the last of the baggage was on board, and then Lady Buller and her daughter stepped ashore, and the shrill whistle gave the signal for casting off the ropes. For a moment there was alnost dead silence—a woman's sob here and there was the only sourd - and then arose the greatest cheer of all that rousing day.

Almost imperceptibly the standing high out of the water, began to glide from the quay side. Sir Redvers, the only quiet man stood like a man of iron at the end of the captain's bridge, gazing with unmoving eyes on the scene of heartthrobbing enthusiasm beneath. Handkerchiefs and hats waved farewell men and women cheered as they had rarely cheered before, and the ship drew gradually away, leaving the sea between the brave men aboard and their dearest friends ashore

Even cheers were unequal to the oc-casion: for ten minutes the great crowd sang "God Save the Queen" and "Rule, Britannia," while Sir Redvera, standing alone, moved not a line of his face. He raised his hat, slowlyalmost automatically-and to the last he looked the living symbol of the unbending, trresistible, all-powerful force which he will lead against the Boers." "Rule, Britannia." were the last words that rang out across the water as the Dunottar Castle sailed away, and the never-moving, bold, and sturdy figure of the gallant general on the bridge to say in answer, "Rule she shall."

SIR REDVERS BULLER

General Sir Redvers Henry Buller, V. C., G. C. B., K. C. M. G., etc., commander in chief of the Britsh forces in South Africa, was born in 1839, but he carries his threewas born in 1839, but he carries his three-score years well.

He commenced his military career forty years ago as an ensign in the 60th Rifles, and received his first baptism of fire in the Chinese war of 1860. In the same year he also received his first step in promotion. In 1873 he underwent the hardships of the Ashantee war, and was present at the cap-ture of Coomassie. For distinguished con-duct in that engagement he was honored with a C. B., and was promoted brevel-major.

duct in that engagement he was honored with a C. B., and was promoted brevel-major.

It was in the Zulu war that he earned his V. C. In command of his Light Horse, he fought in a billy-cock hat and shooting-jacket, and proved himself a born leader of men. Archibald Forbes has drawn Buller at this period of his life: "Buller was a silent, saturnine, bloodthirsty man; as resolute a fighter as ever drew breath."

March 28, 1879 was a memorable day for Buller. At dawn he led a small body of troopers up the Inhlobane Mountain, where they were surprised by an overwhelming number of Zulus. For some hours the fight waged fierce and deadly.

IN THE THICK OF IT he saw one of his troopers hemmed in by Zulus, and making a brave stand against fearful odds. Buller promptly cut a way for himself through the swarming blacks and rescued the hard-pressed soldier, who, however, was destined to be killed later in the day.

This gallant act on the part of Buller would in itself have gained him the V. C., but it was only the forerunner of a series of brave deeds which he performed during that same tussle with the Zulus. So crushing were they in number that Buller saw it was necessary to retire, and the Zulus related down the hill in hot pursuit. Seven men, with Lieutenant Everitt in charge, were deputed to cover the retreat of the main body. Suddenly Sir Redvers saw that Lleutenant Everitt's horse had been killed and that the officer was in imminent danger. Thereupon Sir Redvers pluckily gallered back, and dragged Lieutenant Everitt out of reach of his pursuers. Then snatching a carbine from the lieutenant's hands, Sir Redvers began to blaze at the on-rushing blacks, being gallantly supported by three troopers, and thus the quartette kept the Zulus at bay until the safety of the lieutenant was assured.

While galloping back to the main body. Sir Redvers espied a dismounted trooper, whose fate seemed to be scaled. Buller dashed to the rescue, took the soldier on his own horse, and rode forward.

FROM SHEER FATIGUE,

had fallen out of the ranks. These he successfully brought into the camp. Sir Redvers earned the V. C. many times that Redvers earned the V. C. many times that day.

It goes without saying that he has a very high standard of duty. When the Prince imperial's tragic death was reported to Sir Redvers Buller by the officer was was acting as the Prince's companion, Buller turned on him and, in a tone there was no mistaking, asked: 'But how is it that you are alive?' The effect on the unfortunate officer was crushing.

Martinet though Sir Redvers is, he can unbend at times. A certain principal medical officer attached to Sir Redvers's command in Africa asked as part of the equipment for the field hospitals two fire engines! This extraordinary request, on being forwarded to the headquarters staff, caused no end of amusement, which was added to by this minute in the handwriting of Sir Redvers Buller: 'Will P. M. O. kindly state his reasons for wanting fire engines! Is it oextinguish the burning sands of the desert:'

WAS STATIONED IN ST. JOHN. Gen. Sir Redvers Buller was stationed in St. John for a time in 1868, when he was ceptain of the fourth battalion of the 60th regiment—the King's Royal Rifles.
