

GERTRUDE ATHERTON'S
Selection of a Few of

Hamilton's Letters

Chosen from the great mass of his published state papers and public correspondence in such a way as to give to the average reader for the first time the means of estimating Hamilton's personality from his own words.

With portraits. $1.50 net (13c. postage)

"Mrs. Atherton's success in her main object is surprising; no reader can fail to be attracted by the personality of the man here revealed.

"Vivacity, energy, an indomitable will, unbounded confidence in himself and his abilities, pride, power, passion, extraordinarily clear foresight,—these, together with many engaging qualities, come out so strongly through these letters that they soon make the man real. . . . Among the most interesting portions of the book are the introduction and the notes by Mrs. Atherton, who writes here, as elsewhere, with unflinching virility, force, and interest."

— The Boston Herald.

"A useful and very interesting book. . . . In a way Mrs. Atherton challenges a comparison between the notable portrait of the great financier and the statesman which she drew in 'The Conqueror' and the self-revelation of these letters. There can be no doubt that as a novelist she took unusual pains in fitting herself for the task of writing about the Revolutionary period. And so her novel stands in a place by itself among recent things of the sort. . . . This task has been done with discrimination and dramatic skill. It is a book which cannot be ignored by any admirer of Hamilton."

— The New York Sun.

"The letters about Arnold and André are particularly vivid and moving. All readers of Mrs. Atherton's 'The Conqueror' will feel peculiar interest in seeing Hamilton's own account of the hurricane which forms so prominent a scene in the novel. . . . We commend the book to those who would like to have a first-hand view of the great American in many moods and relations."

— The Outlook.

"It is safe to say that for a thousand who knew the name of Washington, one knew the name of Hamilton. If many more know it to-day, the reason is to be found in 'The Conqueror.' 'Lives' of Hamilton, of course, have been written—it was reserved for Mrs. Atherton to make him really alive to the present generation." — RICHARD LE GALLIENNE in The Boston Transcript.

THE MACMILLAN CO. OF CANADA, LTD.