A TALE TOLD TO A CHILD.

Long years will past and tears will flow, And my young heart grow old, But I shall ne'er forget the tale

The neighbors came and told. Twas round the fire they told the tale. They spoke with trembling breath— I seem to hear their voices now-

"He died a drunkard's death." "In sin he lived, in sin he died.

And east his soul away; And he will stand before God's throne

Upon the judgment day."
This is the tale they told? and now I lie awake at night.

And think I see God judging him, And tremble with affright.

And then there rises in my mind The story of his life; The empty, squalid, cheerless room.
The scene of drunken strife,

His starving wife and children left At home to weep and die, While he, half-senseless, mad with drink

Heeds not their lying cry. And was he once a child like me, A simple, loving child?

And like the Infant Jesus too

So pure, and meek, and mild? And was his guardian angel there To watch him as he fell?

And if he fell, and others fall, May I not fall as well? () God, have mercy on his soul-

And when the struggle comes for me.
O help me then to win. Let long years years pass, and let tears flow, Of you and me be told.

His Pa Was Cornered.

About a month since the wife of the editor of a certain newspaper and mother of the inquisitive young gendleman hereinafter mentioned, had a queer attack of a complaint which left her with another daughter, and affected the editor in pre-cisely the same way, and when their youthful knowledge-glutton came home from school he was considerably surpris-

'In his pocket 'Yes," the editor assented "His vest pocket?" asked the boy.

"Wrapped in a piece of paper ?"

"Yes."
"With its name printed on it?"

What is its name? "Why—son, it is—that is, we have not named it yst," the editor inconsis-tently exclaimed, in the dire moment of his surprise.

"Where do the doctors get the babies tor people?"
"Oh, they find them

"Do they fall in a blanket, pa!"

'Yes, that's what keeps them from being killed.' 'Who holds the blanket?"

"Why, the people close by see a baby falling when it is away up, and they run out and hold the blanket. 'And catch it?"

"Yes."
"And find it?"

"Certainly."
"Then how does the doctors find it if ner.
