CHAPTER XI.

But they were too much engrossed in themselves and the English quill-rille they proposed forming, to take much notice of the quiet girl in a black domino who walked beside them; nor did either of them miss her when a pressure of the crowd divided her from her party, sweeping her away in the stream flowing toward the gardens; or if a thought was wasted toward the absent one, it was only that she must have rejoined her protectress in the conservatory.

However, Trixie, though her heart beat a little faster when she found herself separated from every one she knew, had no intention of seeking Madam von Wernick just yet. She had nerved herself to execute a stratagem that, whether it did or did not have good results, she had resolved to carry through to the end. It would need all her courage to do this, and for a few moments she faltered, and felt that it would be wiser to return to her friend, and quietly enjoy the motley scene around her. But Trixie had overheard words while she was at the modiste's which she could not forget; a reckless man's safety, a too thoughtless woman's honor, might be lost if she shrank from the task she had set herself, and, reminding herself of this, she regained her natural daring.

And now she emerged from a trellised path into the grounds, which, even at this early season of the year, looked charming. The wide lawn, sloping down to the lake, was edged in every direction with lines of hamp, that marked out the portieres, and left the shady walks on either side in that semi-obscure so dear to lovers.

Sauntering toward a large clump of shrubs that stood in an out-of-the-way corner, Trixie disappeared in their shadow for a while, to emerge a transformed creature. The black domino thrown off, she appeared, radiant in a coquettish costume, the facsimile of the one made for Lady Camilla Severn, which she had seen and admired at the modiste's; but, instead of a hood, she had arranged about her head and face a Spanish mantilla of black lace, which, with the help of her black velvet visor, formed a disguise as coquettish as it was effectual.

She now made her way to a part of the grounds where a picturesque fountain had been erected.

Presently, as Trixie sat on the edge of the marble basin, idly drawing the tips of her fingers through the water over which she was bending, a light English carriage was rapidly driven to the gates.

A gentleman in a black domino alighted, and came directly toward the spot where Trixie, with cheeks that crimsoned beneath her visor, was furtively watching him.

Seen by the dim moonlight, his tall figure looked taller and slimmer than it really was; for it was no longer the attenuated, stooping form of an invalid. Charlie Ormsby was now in the prime of his manhood, and would have been pre-eminent had some fit disposition had not left its traces around his eyes; or the mouth, whose smiles had once been so sweet, had not grown harder than it was pleasant to see.

"What! all alone, little lady?" he asked, in the light, jesting strain that seemed suitable to the occasion. "Whom have I the honor of addressing? Some Spanish donzella, whose knight has gone to the wars? or— and now he lowered his voice, and it took a more earnest tone—"or a Scotch lassie, who pines for 'auld lang syne' and the friends she used to love?"

She permitted him to see that in her hand she held a small spray of heather, and the next moment felt that hand carried to his lips and passionately kissed.

"Then he softly breathed the words, 'Camilla—dear, dear Camilla!' and a shudder passed through her frame.

"Hush!" she murmured, below her breath. "Do you know what you are saying, Sir Charles Ormsby?"

"Forgive me!" he replied. "In the joy of seeing you again, I could not help forgetting your commands. Why cannot I release you from the cruel thralldom in which your tyrant holds you?"

"Oh, don't—pray don't!" cried Trixie, really distressed, though not for the reason the baronet imagined.

"I never say you so agitated before, dear Camilla. Surely my note apprising you of my arrival has not fallen into your husband's hands?"

"Colonel Severn was in the vestibule when your note arrived; he opened and read it," said Trixie, who had gleaned this morsel of information in the morning.

"That is unfortunate; and yet it has not been couched in warmer terms than I am justified in using to so dear a friend. But you tremble—you scarcely speak. Is it because you have been exposed to more ill-treatment through my incaution? Is it in defiance of your father's harsh restrictions that you are here to-night?"

Then, Sir Charles Ormsby, blaming himself for having distressed her, tenderly soothed and sustained the shuddering girl, who leaned so trustingly upon him for support.

She quickly withdrew herself from the arm that had stolen around her, and expressed a wish to join her friends.

"But I may go with you?"

"No, Sir Charles; it will be more prudent for you to return to your hotel, and stay there quietly till you hear from me."

But the baronet would not listen to this advice.

"What! leave you before we have interchanged a dozen sentences? Severn may perhaps give me the cold shoulder, but are to be so estranged from all the friends who knew and loved you before you became his wife?"

"Friends! I have none, or I should not have committed this mad act!" sighed Trixie.

MOTHER!

Child's Best Laxative is "California Fig Syrup"

Hurry Mother! A teaspoonful of "California Fig Syrup" now will thoroughly clean the little bowels and in a few hours you have a well, playful child again. Even if cross, feverish, bilious, constipated or full of cold, children love its pleasant taste.

Tell your druggist you want only the genuine "California Fig Syrup" which has directions for babies and children of all ages printed on bottle. Mother, you must say "California." Refuse any imitation.

"Unkind!" exclaimed her auditor. "As long as Charlie Ormsby lives, will you ever be justified in saying that? What is there I would not do for your sake?"

How she would have answered this ardent speech there is no knowing, for just at this moment they found themselves in the center of a party of young men dressed to represent bacchanals. These revellers, perceiving that the couple attempted to avoid the rencontre, instantly made them the objects of their rough sport, and so hemmed them in that escape was impossible.

"Whom have we here?" voiced one. "A pair of misanthropes, growing in the shade over the folly of pleasure! Away with them—they have no business to be here!"

"No, no; they are newly-fledged lovers, rehearsing the immortal Shakespeare in the moonlight!"

Half a dozen of the young men clasped hands in a ring around the embarrassed pair, while the rest executed a grotesque dance to the refrain of a gay drinking-song one of them trotted forth.

Charlie Ormsby and his fair companion were led to the feet of one of the number who was posing as the god Momus, and who had enthroned himself on a fallen tree; Charles, whom they had forced on one knee, shook off the grasp in which they held him, and fiercely stared either of them to lay a hand upon the lady.

Trixie divined that a serious disturbance was impending.

This, however, her own quick wit averted, for, springing forward, she threw herself on the protection of the pseudo god, in whom she had recognized one of the baronet's proteges.

"Signor," she cried, hurriedly, "calm your followers, and permit my departure and that of my friend, or you will give serious offense to your illustrious patroness, Madam de Caspares! Quick—quick! The gentleman with me is her nephew; if he should be embroiled in an affair of which you are the leader, what will she say?"

In less than five minutes apologies had been offered.

Momus and his followers were dashing away to find better food for their mirth, and Sir Charles Ormsby, offering his arm to the still trembling but relieved girl, led her toward the most isolated of the little kiosks or garden-houses with which the grounds were studded.

But as they approached it, a tall, military-looking man, who had been hovering near the open windows of the ballroom, caught a glimpse of Trixie's fluttering robes, and strode rapidly toward the path. Sir Charles was the first to perceive him, and to utter an exclamation.

"It is as I feared, Severn is here, and coming to claim you. By Heaven! Camilla, if he reaches you—in my presence, it will be more than I can bear!"

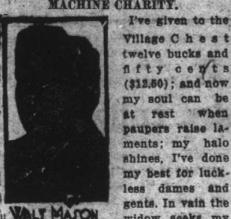

"Is there no way of avoiding him?" Trixie demanded, for the suppressed passion in the baronet's voice warned her that the rencontre would be a dangerous one.

"Yes—yes," was the eager reply. "Down this path there is an entrance to the offices; let us pass through 'em. By turning the key in the first door we come to a room where we may prevent any immediate pursuit."

Quick as thought, they fled, and before the balked and furious colonel could overtake them, Trixie found herself at a devious route to the conservatory, where, not ten paces from the seat Madam von Wernick occupied, Charlie Ormsby enthroned her on a velvet divan, and seated himself at her feet. Involuntarily Trixie's thoughts flew to Beesie Mordaunt. What would she say if she could see the man, the mere mention of whose name had such power over her, seated at the feet of her companion in obscurity and dependence?

MACHINE CHARITY.

I've given to the Village Chest twelve buckles and a fifty-cent gift (valued at $12.50); and now my soul can be at rest when paupers raise lamentations; my halo shines, I've done my best for luckless dames and gents. In vain the widow seeks my door and asks me for a scone; I say, "I'll cough up never more, responsive to your moan; the Village Chest has ample store to comfort those who groan." In vain the weeping orphan comes and asks me for a tart; "Return, oh, orphan, to your slum," I cry in wrath; "depart! The Village Chest has princely sums to heat each broken heart." The footsore pilgrim, going west, implores me for a chew, for he has fainted in his breast, his feet are out of true; "Begone," I cry, "the Village Chest was made for such as you." Some people give the Village Chest what coin they can command, and still are prone, at woe's behest, to lend a helping hand; such lavish methods I am blest if I can understand. The Village Chest is my excuse for every selfish plan; for drying up the kindly juice that should pervade a man; and I shall turn no kopecks loose—I'm of the Tightwad clan.

Just Folks.
By EDGAR A GUEST

AROUND THE WORLD.
I met a dusty traveller along the road one day.
And plainly he was homeward bound from half the world away.
And he had been to foreign ports on seas I'd never seen,
And heard the talk of men afar where I had never been.

"Oh, tired and dusty traveller," said I "pray tell to me
What did you find in London town, so far across the sea?
What did you learn in Portugal, what did you see in Spain,
And do they sing and dance and laugh across the bounding main?"

"And do they have their little cares who live in ancient Rome?"
And do the children romp and play the way they do at home?
Oh, tell me, dusty traveller, what have you found afar?
I'd like to know what pleases them and what their sorrows are."

"Oh, yes," he said, "they dance and sing wherever you may go,
And everywhere they think and talk just like the folks you know,
And whether shins be brown or white, the hearts of men are fair;
And though you tramp the world around, there's friendship everywhere."

"They weep when sorrow comes to them, they smile when skies are blue,
In times of care good neighbours come to learn what they can do,
Though strange their speech and strange their ways, one common bond we know—
A kindly deed is understood no matter where you go."
