

HELEN MOIR

OR LOVE AND HONOUR. A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XXIII.

ANXIOUS DAYS AT ARDENHAM—EDWIN AND RITCHIE IN LONDON.

What a change from the quietude of Ardenham to the rushing roar of the London streets...

After securing lodgings in a hotel, and discussing a comfortable breakfast, they sallied forth to pay a visit to Mr. Weggate...

Mr. Weggate was a ruddy-faced, pleasant, elderly man, with thin curly hair, which was turning to grey...

Without a word Mr. Weggate folded the parchment he had been examining, laid it on the pile, tied the whole together with a string...

"Now, sir," he said, quite heartily, "pray sit down. I am entirely at your service. Shall your servant wait in the outer room?"

"No, indeed. This is my friend as well as my servant—a very worthy Scotchman, named Ritchie Dunlop, who is as greatly interested in the business we have come about as I am myself. Aren't you, Ritchie?"

"Atweel an I, sir, or I wadna hae been so impudent as stay in the room, or even tae come intae it for that matter."

"Bless my soul, is that the Dorie I hear?" cried the lawyer, regarding Ritchie's sturdy form with admiration.

"The genuine Dorie," exclaimed Edwin, "though not more genuine than the man who speaks it. This, Mr. Weggate, is one of Nature's true condlames—generous, honest, self-denying, and single-hearted. When you know him, and what he has done, you will respect him highly."

"Whisht, Maister Edwin," said Ritchie, blushing like a girl. "I am 'nae better norither folk, and no near sae guid as many."

"Ah, so you, in you artless simplicity, suppose, but Mr. Weggate will judge for himself when he knows all the circumstances now to be related to him. These, however, will come in their due place. First of all, Mr. Weggate, I have to speak to you of my uncle."

crime, and was the victim of a foul conspiracy. Weggate smiled incredulously, and shook his head with the wise superiority of legal self-possession.
