Discard These Words.

An excellent clipping for the scrapbook of young writers, and possibly old ones also, is the following list of words which the late William Cullen Bryant forbade to be used in his paper, the New York Evening Post. While some of the expressions may at present satisfy all the demands of propriety, the greater number are objectionable, and their use should be avoided. The list, modified somewhat by other influential journalists, is as follows:—
"Above or over, for more than all;

we were waiting for another opportunity to jab the monster Mottini noticed his head appear above water on the port side of the boat. This time it dived just at the water line, its long tusk or sword penetrating the planks as though they were of paper. Pino was heard to scream as though he had been shot. I turned to learn the cause of his cries again and struck the boat a terrific blow turned to learn the cause of his cries, when I noticed that the sword had passed through the fleshy part of Pino's leg, tearing the flesh and crunching the word of the boat as it passed out. Water began to rush into the boat through the hole, and the horror of sinking was added to the dangers from the monster. I stuffed some old sacks into the hole as quickly as possible and bandaged Pino's leg, which was bleeding profusely. Mottino took the oars and pulled with might and main until we reached shallow water, when we pulled to the Black Point Cove. where we removed our wounded companion to his but and summoned medi-

THE HOLY COAT.

Was it Woven by Our Lady! A Probable Theory.

The Very Rev. George Canon Hobson, of the Church of the Sacred Heart, Exeter writes:—"I have read all the very interesting matter about the Holy Coat at Treves contained in five numbers of the Catholic Times. I have been somewhat forcibly struck with an omission I observed in those numbers, and which I have equally observed in the other Catholic papers.

I do not know whether it has been deliberately done or not, but the English Catholic papers have failed to bring out if they have not entirely ignored, this fact-granted the Robe, now being exhibited at Treves, is actually the seam-less garment of Our Blessed Lord for which the soldiers cast lots—then it is probably a garment woven by the hands of Our Blessed Lady for her Divine Son in His Childhood, and which grew with his growth.

"Maldonatus, commenting on v. 35 of St. Mathew, c. 27, says: Vulgaris est opinio, probabilitate non careus, funicam illum inconsutilem a Matre Christo adhue pueco juctam jaisse — There is a common belief, which is not altogether improbable, that this seamless garment was made by Our Lord's mother for Him whilst He was a child. Therefore, of course, it must have grown with His growth. And this is just what Cornelius a Lapide explicitly states in his commentary on the same passage. He writes: "Enthymicus says there is an old standing belief (which he himself accepts) that this seamlesss gar ment was made and weven by the Blessed Virgin for Our Lord whilst He was a child. Consequently, it would seem that the garment grew with Our Lord's growth, as the garments of the Hebrews grew during their 40 years sojourn in the desert. This seamless garment is now religiously preserved and visited at

"To insist on this most interesting tradition may, perhaps, somewhat sharpen the shafts of some infidel writers, but consistent Protestants, if such there be with the Book of Deuteronomy in their hands, should not object to it.

"I will only add that, as I knelt before that holy garment at Treves and pictur-or to myself our Blessed Lady making g with her pure, virginal hands, St. Joseph often taken it into his holy hands, and Our Diessed Lord wearing it and staining it with Precious Blood, I realised the mystery of the Incarnation in a manner as which it has never before presented True boy mind."
