

The subjects of Her Majesty who live nearer to the fishing grounds than those immediately represented in the British Parliament, and who bear the burden of protecting them against encroachments, and depend upon them largely for their means of living, perhaps feel more keenly the necessity of insisting that citizens of the United States should abide by their national compact.