The World's Changes.

BY ENG.—A FARMERSVILLE BOY.

The swift-winged Shadow, that bears in his hands
The conquering scythe and the glass of sands,
Once paused on his way as he passed alone
O'er a warlike city's towers of stone.
"How long has this city been here?" he said.
And the man in the watch-tower shook his head.
"This city," said he, "hath been here of old,
And has sent forth many a warrior bold
To subdue the haughty cities around,
And raze their dwellings down to the ground.
Such as would fight soon found their graves,
And those who were humble we made them slaves.
Late and early we cause them to toil,
In the artizan's shop or in tilling the soil,
While we live at our ease, and we play or we fight,
And live by the rule that might gives us right."
"Alas!" said the Shadow, "that man to man
Should be so inhuman ('tis not God's plan)."
He must be depraved, and entirely so,
Who would bring on his fellow such terrible woe.
I will leave at once this murderous place."
And he wandered away to the realms of space.

Then after a thousand years were o'er,
The Shadow passed over that spot once more.
No city, no warrior was there to be seen,
No walls, no towers, no slaves, I ween;
But a fisherman's barque, on the ocean wide,
Was wafted about by the wind and tide.
"Where now," said the Shadow, "is that city which stood
Where now I see nothing but heaving flood,
With its minarets, towers and walls of stone?
And those cruel warriors, where have they gone?
Is the city sunk beneath these waves?
And where are those warriors?—where are their slaves?
And the fisherman dashed the salt spray from his brow,
Saying, "The ocean hath ever been here same as now.
No warlike city was ever here—
No cringing slave who trembled with fear—
No cruel warrior with sword and shield—
For men are still seeking what oceans yield.
Though slaveholding still, with its iron hand,
Is found on the ocean as well as on land,
"Enough," said the Shadow, "of slavery and wars;
Then hid him away 'mong the fixed stars.

But after a thousand years were o'er,
He paused o'er the self-same place once more.
No ocean was there—but a prairie wide
Had taken the place of the surging tide.
Volcanoes and earthquakes had changed the scene,
And nature had formed this prairie green
Rude dwellings of men were there to be seen,
Although they were few and far between,
And the soil was tilled by toiling slaves
Who were kept in bondage by a few rich knaves
Whose soldiers kept the people in awe,
While the rich had the making of the law.
"How long," said the Shadow, "hath this prairie been here?"
Thus he said to a countryman standing near.
To this enquiry the countryman said,
"This prairie's been here since the world was made,
And such flocks and herds as may now be seen
Have always roamed o'er its pastures green."
"Not so," said the Shadow, "but I must away,
For I am allowed but one moment to stay."
And in a moment the Shadow was gone
And left the countryman standing alone.

But after a thousand years had gone round
The Shadow again in that place was found.
What now met his gaze? 'twas a forest of trees
Whose yielding branches waved in the breeze.
Some were short and some were tall,
Some were large and others small,
And some of very great age were found,
While others lay rotting on the ground,
And venomous serpents and beasts of prey
In this wilderness vast had long held sway,
And human beings, though a barbarous race,
Were also found who lived by the chase.
