

FICKLE OF FORTUNE

CHAPTER XVII.

When Mr. Augustus Melton, all fire and impetuosity, dashed into the sitting-room where he expected to find Doris Glyn, he grew suddenly calm and meek and crestfallen on finding himself face to face with another lady. "How do you do?" said Hilda, with a very frigid bend of the head.

"Oh—er—I'm quite well, thank you. Very glad to see you. Er—where is—er—Mrs. Glyn?"

"Mrs. Glyn has asked me to see you for her, as she does not feel equal to receiving visitors this evening."

"Visitors? No. But she might see me, I should think."

"Unfortunately Mrs. Glyn does not see any reason for making a distinction. I don't know what you mean, Miss Warren," broke out Gussie violently. "I tell you I must see Doris."

"Hardly against her will, I should think! Even you would scarcely venture on that."

"I tell you I have news for her of the most vital importance."

"Then you may intrust it to me, and I will undertake to convey it to her in the most accurate manner."

"Again and again Gussie glanced at the closed folding-doors, as if he suspected Doris to be within hearing, and hoped that his words might bring her out. But Hilda apparently paid no heed to the direction of his eyes, and remained so indifferent that he ended by keeping his gaze fixed upon her.

"What I have to say concerns her husband; it can not be to her gently."

"Then it is as well that the telling should not be in your hands."

"Gussie, who had been busily brushing his hat with his hand, now grasped it firmly and rose.

"Sit down," said Hilda, who you have to say, to me," said Hilda, imperiously; and, after standing for a moment in an attitude of heroic indignation, he sat down.

"Mr. Hodson has failed on the Stock Exchange, and has run away from his wife; and she has run away from him, and David Glyn has run after her," he blurted out, simply.

"Hilda sat quite still, with her head tilted at the same contemptuous angle as before, and uttered a short ejaculation of supreme disgust.

"And do you think that would be a proper communication to make to Mrs. Glyn?"

"At any rate, it is something she must know."

"And something you are glad to be able to tell!" she cried, her tone changing suddenly into one of the utmost severity. "Here are tidings, shocking enough to kill a sensitive woman like Doris, and you ring them out with triumph, thinking that one man's fall must be another man's victory!"

"She can get a divorce," suggested Gussie, in a low voice.

"What would she gain by that?"

"To take another of you, I suppose! She will be in a great hurry to do that after such an experience!"

"You are too hard, Miss Warren," said Gussie, uneasily, moving restlessly on his chair and looking at his hat. "Men are not all alike, any more than women are. You don't think that—that I would have treated a—a woman so?"

"No; but you would have done something a great deal worse if I hadn't happened to be here."

"Gussie started, and looked up with a hot angry flush on his face. But Hilda continued pitilessly—

"You know how delicate a woman's position is when her husband abandons her; and yet, without a moment's thought for her name, you bounce over here, all passion and sympathy and goodness knows what, to show up your own beautiful devotion in sharp contrast to the other man's neglect, never caring what the consequences may be, ready to risk what people may say of her, or the danger of her husband's turning round upon her, and declaring that it was well-founded jealousy which made him cruel. Oh, you men are noble creatures! I am glad I was born a woman, that I may have the privilege of falling down and worshipping you!"

"How dare you say such things to me! How dare you talk to me as if I was a cur! You abuse your feminine privilege when you say such things to a man as that."

"Am I sorry your delicate ears have to listen to such unpleasant truths. And now, having given your message, don't you think you had better leave the den of ivy to me? I will put your conduct in its most chivalrous light, I assure you."

"You are too hard; you will be sorry some day for having spoken to me like this. Perhaps I have been rash; but I have been nothing worse. I never thought of what people would say; I only thought of her being alone without any friends. And she has always treated me like a boy, and so, hot-headed fool, I came. I am sorry now. I will go back to-night, if I can, and nobody shall know I came. And—and I am sure, if you have any heart at all, and if you are not all tongue—with a resentful, wounded look at her—you will be sorry presently for having spoken to me like that. And—and I wish I could leave her in the hands of a sweeter comforter. Good-evening, Miss Warren."

Hilda was touched. She would not have let him go like this; but, before she could do more than raise her head to speak, the folding-doors opened and Doris came in.

Gussie drew a long breath, struck with horror at the change in her. The fair goddess-hair was gone, the placid eyes were dull and troubled; new and sudden frowns in the smooth face made it look years older. She held out her hand to the young man with a smile strangely different from the old serene one, but her voice was kinder than ever.

"I'm glad to see you, Gussie, believe me. Hilda has been rather hard upon you; but you will forgive her, for she is just a girl, and you know what generosity filling prompted her severity. Stay in Paris until to-morrow morning, and you shall take us both back to England."

Gussie bowed over her hand, she still held as if he had been receiving the commands of an empress. Whether it was owing to Hilda's presence or not, her husband's desertion had taken Doris further away from him than ever.

"When I may come again in the morning," he stammered out lamely.

HARVEST TIME!

There are just three prime essentials which make for economy and thrift on the customers' standpoint: knowing WHAT to buy, knowing WHEN to buy, and knowing WHERE to buy.

Now is the time to reap the full benefit from autumn purchases—and this the spot to secure them at. No trouble to find what you want from our assortment.

We would have you consider that we have exerted every effort known to modern merchandising to provide a showing of fall merchandise which will surpass all others in point of attractiveness.

How well we have succeeded is shown in the big displays, the choice styles and qualities, and the exceptionally low schedule of prices.

The public recognizes sterling worth; shoppers know good things when they see them. That accounts for eager crowds to be found at this store.

May we expect you, too, to-morrow?

R. McKAY & CO.

"No, granny, dear, I don't want to appear in any court at all. I want to wait for him—or for him to come back to me," she ended, in a whisper.

"My dear child, you don't understand the case yet," said Mrs. Edgcombe, with autoergetic asperity. As she had made this marriage, so she now held herself qualified, upon its proving a failure, to break it. "David Glyn has misused your money to the extent of crippling your income considerably; Mr. Hamlin, your remaining trustee under your father's will, says he has, as far as he can make out, lost every penny it was in his power to risk. To trust yourself any longer in the power of a man who has proved to be little better than a common swindler would be madness. I cannot allow it."

Doris was silent for a few minutes, looking at the fire. Then she said, in such a low voice that it was almost a whisper:

"Granny, David has behaved very badly, I know. But it wasn't his fault as much as hers. And I—I think he had something to complain of in me. Will you try to hush it up, and wait a little? If he does not come back, why, then, you must do as you please, and I will do as you please; but I would rather take him back—if he would come—now, Granny, you must humor me, or I—I shall break my heart!"

Mrs. Edgcombe held out her arms, and Doris sobbed for some minutes softly with her head in the old lady's lap. Then she rose and dried her tears, and, without another word, but with one look exchanged by sorrowful eyes, the compact was sealed between them.

For a fortnight no news was heard of David. Mr. Hodson, to escape his creditors, had gone abroad. It was now clearly proved that his foolish client had swamped in speculation, under his direction, some thirty-three thousand pounds. Doris cared little about the loss of her money, and would not allow that, in risking it, David had been worse than foolish; she bore her mournful semi-widowhood with quiet dignity, and refused to leave town, as her grandmother wished her to do, hoping against hope some day for her husband's return. She persisted, with this object in view, in remaining in her own house, instead of staying at Mrs. Edgcombe's, as the latter wished. He would come home some evening quietly, she thought, and, walking into the drawing-room with the cold look she knew so well, would express great surprise that she had felt any uneasiness on his account. Oh, how she would welcome the coldest look now!

For Doris felt within her a sense of dealing with his chilling moods which she had never felt before. Since he had warmth of feeling for another woman, she argued, why should he not in time have some for her, too, now that, with amazing perversity, there had grown up in her, since the discovery of her delinquencies, a tenderness which she had never felt for the immaculate marble
