"It must be very pleasant to feel oneself rich!" she says, with a soft little sigh.
"It must, indeed!" Mr. Blamire says, gravely, and as he utters the words her tadyship fifts those drooping, white eyelides of hers for the space of a second, and a lurid glance, like a flame, seems to leap out from behind the long, auburn eyelashes and makes him wince, as from a gleam of lightning.
There is another pause, and then the lady looks up, and fixes her greenishblue eyes, dilating and glowing like jewels beneath the shadow of the fringing lashes, steadily on the lawyer's face.
"Tell me—I wish you would tell me," she says, softly, in a low, persuasive voice in gentle tones, with those magnetic eyes gazing into his in a close unwavering regard, "is Lady Cardonnel

"No. And yet she always talked of being very rich-of having 'heaps of money!' "Lady Christabel says, disdain-

Mr. Blamire knows the phrase well, having been rather a favorite with iss Surtees.

Miss Surtees,
"Then that explains her having overdrawn her bank account in buying her trousseau!" continues the woman, speaking with a smile of contempt. "In fact, only this morning she had to borrow fifty pounds of me. She said she was going to write to her lawyer—that is you, I suppose—to sell out five hundred pounds' worth of securities—railway shares, or something of that kind," with another little moue of dainty disdain. another little moue of dainty disdain, "and to send her the money."

ing."

"Oh, you have brought her the money?" she says, playing with her teaspoon.

"No, no, Lady Christabel: I have not brought Lady Cardonnel any money. I did not know she wanted any." Mr. Blamire replies, dryly.

"That is a curious state of affairs:" he easy, mentally. "Lydia Surfees has certainly altered in every way. Her new dignities seem to have turned her brain. Overdrawn her bank account, and then borrowing fifty pounds from her haughty bearing later, who evidently despises her!"

forward without delay."
"It is all very well for you to talk. Mr.
Blamire. I don't deny that Lady Cardonnel is very well off. You are very well off, too, I dare say. You have no idea what it is to have every shilling of your pocket money borrowed for an indefinite time by your stepmother, and you up to your eyes in debt to your modiste at the same time."

She ends by another of those gay, shrill laughs, rather a hysterical laugh, Mr. Blamire fancies, and he suddenly perceives a solution of her meaning. "Fisher yan earl's daughter stooping to such an old, shabby trick of impecunious womanhood!" he thinks, scornfully. "Not but what I've known earls' daughters to do as shabby things as anybody else's daughters."

"If I might be allowed, Lady Chritabel," he says, courteously, but with no diffidence now, "as Lady Cardonnel's and diffidence now, "as Lady Cardonnel's agent, to prevent you from feeling any inconvenience from this loar." He is drawing out his well-filled pocketbook, as he speaks, and, looking up, he sees her eyes glitter like a cat's eyes. "I shall esteem it a favor if you will permit me to pay this little debt without waiting for her remittance.

"You—you are very kind. I didn't want you to pay Lady Cardonnel's debts," she says, in low tones, biting her lips and staring at the money with distended eyes. "I—I oughtn't to take it from you. But I reallly want some money very much just now, and—"
"Pray do not think anything of such a trifling obligation, Lady Christabel."
Mr. Blaunire urges, more kindly. "I am only acting as Lady Cardonnel's agent, you know. Vam happy to be of service to you. Would you prefer Italian money?"
Unfortunately, I have scarcely any in gold. Would you like notes?"
"No, thank you," she answers quickly.

The girlish naivete of this remark does not much impress Mr. Blamire, although Lady Cardonnel flatters herself that it has had its effect.

"I dare say my Lady Christabel would like a little confidence in return for her condescension!" he thinks, and the next remark made by "my Lady Christabel" makes him emile to himself at the correctness of his guess.

"It must be very pleasant to feel oneself rich!" she says, with a soft little sigh.

to the Villa Marati, and never punged into the middle of the family discords and difficulties of Lord and Lady Cardonnel. "I dare say I should have heard of them soon enough," he muses, vexedly. "I might as well have had my holiday in peace. Lydia Surtees' aristocratic marriage doesn't seem to promise absolute bliss for the future!"

"Will you try half a cup of tea after my recipe, Mr. Blamire? Do!" he hears the soft voice-saying, while he is deep in vexed thought. His first impulse is to say "No." decidedly, as he detests all so-called "improvements" on good, black tea, sugar and cream. "Do, Mr. Blamire; only half a cup? It is so nice, when you get used to it!" she urges, smiling.
