The Sun says of a meeting of Prohibitionists held last week in Fredricktown: The citizens of Fredricktown deliberately decided that the adoption of the Scott Act would be a public advantage and that the law should be enforced. It is a question of honor. It appears now that the law is not being enforced and the citizens are taking the necessary steps to compel respect for their homes.

There are now 984,579 families in England—a decrease of 79,019 from the families of 1871. The families are larger now than they were ten years ago, having an average of 5.19 persons each, whereas in 1871 the average was 5.06. The number of houses has increased, but the number of houses has disappeared to the number of 43,619, while buildings used as accessories to farms and for business purposes have increased to the number of 15,228.

Any policy that attempts the pacification of a portion of the British empire in this nineteenth century by gagging the press, impressing members of the press, or by any other means of silencing women for advising the people not to pay rent, must, of course, involve a failure. When Mr. Gladstone ordered the arrest of the women who were members of the constitution he confessed the failure of his policy, for it must be borne in mind in discussing this question that the women were not arrested for any offence which comes within the purview of British law.

But the failure is not Mr. Gladstone's, it is the failure of the policy.

A French writer calculates that the two tunnels which are now being carried under the British channel from opposite directions will, if the works are persevered in, meet in about five years; and that it would take another five years to enlarge and finish off the tunnel, which would thus be finished by 1891. But the great scheme does not appear to have yet passed beyond the region of speculation, and the fear is expressed that the journey of twenty-five miles, under the ocean, will prove too disagreeable to attract many passengers.
