The Heir?

In T was all I had, excepting a few shillings,' replied Cottie, biting her lip to keep the tears back. 'Oh, dear! Well, you must try and find her and get it back. You had better go to the police-station; it is in the middle of High Street, which you will come to in a few minutes; it is straight on. But your friends will know what to do in the matter.'

Cottie looked down. 'I haven't any friends,' she said in low voice. Eva had gathered up her reins preparatory to driving ou; but she checked the horse and looked at the slim, boyish figure and handsome face with reawakened interest 'No, friends! Do you mean that you are a stranger here?' she asked.

Cottie nodded. 'Yes; quite a stranger. I don't know anyone.' Eva's eyes opened with surprise. The boy was too well dressed for a tramp; his face, his eyes, were as ingenuous as a child's; it was impossible to suspect him of guile and deceit. And yes-the story sounded incredible. 'Why have you come here? where have you come from?' she asked. Cottie coloured slightly. It was a lifficult question to answer unless she told the whole of her story, and she had no intention of doing that, even to this lady with the angelic face. 'I've just come Australia,' she said, after a momentary pause, 'I've come from the gold diggings, and I had all my money with me - and now it's stolen.

But why did you come here to Sta borough, if you had no friends get up beside me, and I'll drive you here?' asked Eva, gently enough, but with faint surprise.

'I'd heard of it over there,' replied Cottie, 'and I wanted to see it. I-I was going to school-at least. I think sb. But it doesn't matter. I must find some work to do, I suppose.'

She tried to put a brave face on it and smile, but she had to struggle with a sigh. With her experience of the world she knew the difference between pockets filled with banknotes and empty ones.

Eva gazed at her musingly. She knew that, in accordance with our novel system of benevolence, she ought to direct the lad to the workhouse and drive on; but Eva could not accustom herself to the new system of charity, and felt that it was impossible to leave this pretty boy alone and friendless by the road-side.

'It is a most extraordinary storyshe began, hesitatingly.

Cottie flushed, and her eyes opened wide reproachfully. 'Do you mean you don't believe me?' she said.

Of course I believe you. Why should you tell me a falsehood? You say you have some money-you are not begging?'

Cottie lugged out her remaining money and held it out for Eva's in-

'Begging! I never begged in my life, even when I hadn't a penny, and was right down hungry. I didn't want to tell you anything. It was you who asked me!' she exclaimed, indignantly, and she turned away, remembering to take off her cap as she Eva was smitten by compunction. 'Oh, stop, stop!' she cried. 'Ididn't mean to wound you; onlyonly it does sound so strange, and you are a stranger, and they are always laughing at me. Oh, I do hope he'll come back !' she added to herself with vexation--for Cottie was

' .)h, please stop! There's a good boy! I really didn't mean it; aud I've made you cry, too!

'It's a story! I'm not crying! retorted Cottie, her eyes flashing through the threatening tears. You couldn't make me cry if you tried!

'Oh, what a strange boy!' Eva nurmured, in a confusion of admiration, sympathy and remorse. 'Here, to the police-station. Now, don't be obstinate and refuse' -as Cottie eyed the dog-cart doubtfully- 'or I shall never forgive myself, and be haunted Cottie put her toe on the step and sprang into the cart, and the horse, who was wanting to get home and was tired of all this stopping and turning, rose on its hind legs as Eva put him round again.

Don't be frightened; he doesn't nean anything,' she said, encouraging-

'I'm not frightened,' said Cottie, a little scornfully. 'I was never frightened of a horse in my life. I could ride this one bare-backed.'

Eva stared at her and laughed. 'You are the strangest boy I ever net,' she said under her breath. Cot coloured and winced suspiciously. One moment you're half crying, like -like a girl; the next you are as

as a London street-boy. Now tell me your name.' 'Ronald Bell,' replied Cottie, cooly, and, in as boyish a voice as she could assume. 'What is yours?' Eva smiled at the direct retort

'Mine is Eva Rashleigh,' she said, and I live at Rashleigh Hall with my brother, Sir Edward. You say you have come from the gold diggings; you look like a sailor.' Well, I've just come from board of ship; you wouldn't have me go to form.

sea in riding-breeches and jumper would you?' retorted Cottie.

Eva laughed; for though the retort had been sharp and ready enough, it had not, strange enough, seemed to her an impudent one.

'Of course not : though I haven't the least idea what a jumper is. And have you come alone? Did not your father, mother, or any of your friends, come with you?' Cottie shook her head. Then she emembered Sheeney.

'My-uncle was coming, but he lost his ship,' she said, reluctantly. Eva drew a breath of relief.

'Oh, well; he will be over soonthe next vessel,' she said, 'and you must meet him.'

'I don't want to meet him, thank you,' responded Cottie. Eva stared at her.

'Not want to meet him?' 'No: I don't like him,' said Cottie, guardedly. 'Besides he may not come at all. It doesn't matter. I can get on very well. I can find some 'Why, what can you do?' asked Eva, her interest in the handsome boy increasing each moment. 'Oh, anything,' replied Cottie, confidently, though a trifle evasively. 'But you have been gold-digging, and there are no gold-diggings here in England,' remarked Eva. 'But won't worry you with questions We will wait until you have seen the police. Oh, what is the matter?' for Cottie had broken in with an exclam-'What is that - what place is that?' They had reached the point of the road from which a view of the castle could be obtained, and Cottie was staring at the place with wide-open
