Mr Pemberton very properly remarked upon the impropriety of Fenton making arrests without first being sworn in as a special constable. Some very unpleasant inferences were drawn by Inspector Welch in his evidence against Fenton; but the latter retaliated by putting certain questions to the Inspector which the latter declined to answer. It is certainly due the public that persons who are employed as watchmen and policemen should court the fullest, investigation into their present and past conduct; and it is also highly necessary that the status of private watchmen should be defined at once, so that mistakes and scandals shall not again arise.
