This story is regarded about Paris as something similar to that of the first taking of Sebastopol, and has already obtained the appellation of " Canard a la Tartar."

Despatches from Berlin speak of a similar statement of things, and it is expected that a combination exists both in Paris and Brus-

Pacha endeavouted to induce them to send a portion of the troops from the Crimea to Asia. Omar offered to proceed with the 25,000 men whom he brought from Eupatoria, to Asia, for the purpose of relieving Kars. All the Generals and Admirals were unanimous in rejecting his proposal, and as he still maintained his opinion, he left for Constantinople, to lay the plan before the Sultan. In order to counteract Omar's proceedings, the General wrote thus to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe:—" Use your power, full-influence to cause our opinion to prevail over that of His Highness, for great public inference at stake, and serious conce-
