

does more for his callers than they do for him. He never sends his friends a doleful message, but is an optimist through and through. And this man, whose plan of life was changed by a power not his own, who was turned from a life of increasing effectiveness in the wide field of service into a quiet room to suffer, where the windows of the world about him have darkened into night, lives on, loves on, hopes on, because he has the victory of faith and has found the grace of God sufficient for all his need. We thank God for his example now, which is mightier than any sermon he ever preached. He knows that his disease is incurable, and he knows not when he shall be summoned to eternal life and light, but his victory is already won, and all the rest is a small matter.

I have written so much because I want you to read this book as if you could see him in his sick chamber, as if you could hear his message in the same cheerful
