

There would be objections raised, but they can be met.

Adoption of this plan involves no longer charging subsidies to working expenses of Post Office.

Whether they be still paid out of Post Office revenue is immaterial.

The excessive payments on the Brindisi route have still to be reckoned with.

The Post Office must reform that.

At any rate it must not over-charge correspondence to meet its unnecessary extravagance.

There are material distinctions between this scheme and others hitherto placed before the public.

Whether the Colonial Governments will adopt these rates or not, the United Kingdom should lead the way alone.
