CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE NAVY.

Under the caption "Imperial Defence and Colonial Responsibilities," Lieut. L. H. Horden, R.N., contributes an interesting article to The United Service Magazine. Taking the great European nations as the likely source from which any attack on Great Britain or the colonies would come, he points out that the British empire presents a long defence front against the hypothetical foe. Of this defence front the British Isles constitute the extreme left flank and Japan, England's new ally, the extreme right flank. The long line which the empire thus presents to the European powers runs thru the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, the Straits of Malacca, etc.; it consists of fixed land positions, such as Gibraltar, Malta, Aden, India, Singapore and Hong Kong, which are connected by the fleets of the navy; and behind this extended front, and protected behind it, lie the great colonies, Canada, South Africa, Australia, and also numerous smaller portions of the empire.

Lieut. Horden is anxious that the great outlying sections of the empire should grasp this idea of a great herring line, as it were, the European nations and their Asiatic outposts. He wants the "younger nations" of the empire to appreciate the importance of the firm maintenance of this long encircling net, for once it is broken or even, Canada, the new antipodean commonwealth, the prospective federation of South Africa, and the other outlying dominions would be at the mercy of the invading fleets of the enemy.

From this point the writer goes on to argue that it will not be sufficient for their own welfare for the "colonies" to confine their efforts to naval defence purely to their own contiguous waters. The defence of the colonial ports should be left to the colonial land forces, and the colonial fleets should push out to the empire's front line of defence, for once this is broken the enemy could concentrate his force upon any of the colonies he chose. Lieut. Horden puts it thus:

The interests of the colonies therefore demand that whatever naval forces they have should be available for use either in the front line or as commerce-defence cruisers, perhaps at considerable distances away from their own coasts; and that the defence of their ports and coaling stations should be provided for by their land forces, while the ships they should never even see their own shores during the war, if the defence is effective. It does not follow from this that the colonies should take no part in the naval defence of the empire; on the contrary, it has been argued that they are most vitally interested in this failure to maintain the line might result in their annexation by Russia or Germany, and the result of this may be left to them to imagine.

The argument is rather that they should take a wider view than is implied in local navies, and should not only assist in holding the front, but should claim their share of the burdens of empire and their share in its councils. * * * If England had confined her attention to local needs and had left Imperial questions to take care of themselves, where would the colonies be now? Scarcely self-governing states under the flag of the union. Either they would be separate and independent colonies of some other power, and in either case the sum they would now be paying for the defence of the British Empire, while their risks would be much greater.

Of course, if the writer's proposal were agreed to, the difficulty of giving the colonies a voice in the management of the Imperial navy, but he believes that this can be arranged, and that the Admiralty would be improved by an admixture of colonial energy.

Lieut. Horden calls upon the colonies to "wake up" in this matter, as they have asked the Mother Country to wake up commercially, and concludes as follows:

If they (the colonies) will not assist in the maintenance of the first line of defence, they should at least free our hands to concentrate as many ships there as possible. From their position, they are splendidly placed to protect the trade of the empire in rear of the line of battle squadrons. Australia might, for instance, provide for the whole of the trade in the Southern Indian Ocean, and might have advanced bases at Zanzibar, Seychelles, and Mauritius. New Zealand might guard the trade-routes in the Southern Pacific; Canada, the North Atlantic; South Africa, the Southern Atlantic, with advanced bases at Ascension, St. Helena and the Falkland Islands; and the northern part of the North Atlantic, leaving to Great Britain the trade-routes between Britain and the United States; while the United States should be undertaken in conjunction with the Admiralty. If the arguments raised above are sound, these ships in war should be based not on local but on Imperial requirements, as in the distribution of the war of the navy along the front it must hold. The defence of the empire is a matter more of front attention, but it must be treated as a whole and the colonies should recognize this and their responsibilities.

Canada is not looking for war. In fact, she wants to avoid it, and perhaps a due appreciation of such suggestions for Imperial contingencies as Lieut. Horden suggests will enable her to avoid it.

UNCLE SAM IN EUROPE. The people of Rumania have for years oppressed the poor Jews resident in that country, and one result of this oppression has been a wholesale emigration of a very undesirable class of citizens to the United States. ROYAL GRANADIERS AT "SAINTS" FOR UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE

Crack Regiment Turned Out 411 Strong on Their First Parade Under New Colonel.

SERMON BY CHAPLAIN BALOWIN BASED ON LATIN AND IS MELODIOUS Twenty Years Given as Time Limit for Public Appearances to Acquire the Speech.

There was an excellent turnout of the Royal Grenadiers on their annual church parade on Sunday afternoon. Their chaplain, Rev. Arthur H. Baldwin, delivered an inspiring sermon in All Saints' Church.

When the service commenced the church was comfortably filled. The Rev. Mr. Baldwin spoke from the text, Timothy II, 3: "A good soldier of Jesus Christ." He stated that one of the first orders issued by the commander of the regiment was for a soldier to be a man who was remembered by the men. Progress was made on the day of the day, said the speaker, and the regiment was a good specimen of a soldier of Jesus Christ.

After the sermon the choir rendered an anthem and the band a selection. The Rev. Mr. Baldwin then presided over a meeting of the Landlords and Tenants to confer with Capt. Shaw-Taylor.
