WILCOX BROS.

Spring : Truants

By W. F. BRYAN.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

"Where are you going, Buster?" Halvord looked down upon the sturdy figure of Dicky Bennington, otherwise "Buster," with a twinkle in the kindly gray eyes.

"Playin' hockey," explained Buster promptly. "Want some? Playin'!"

"For a moment Brian Halvord regarded the boy with judicial gravity. "You know very well," he began, "that after such a confession, it is my bounden duty to see that you are delivered into the tender clutches of Miss Stoddard." He reminded, "And yet here I am seriously considering sharing in your crimes and your pleasures, Buster."

"You know very well," he began, "that after such a confession, it is my bounden duty to see that you are delivered into the tender clutches of Miss Stoddard." He reminded, "And yet here I am seriously considering sharing in your crimes and your pleasures, Buster."

"The fish are bitin' fine, Jimmy Morrow got 'leven yesterday," said Buster defensively. "I got two knee I brought one for Bud Schenck, but Bud was 'traid."

"Clearly this is the intervention of Providence," declared Halvord laughingly. "Lead on, my youthful tempter! But suppose we stop for some lunch first."

Halvord's boarding house was just around the corner and soon he had an ample lunch put up to supplement Buster's well-filled box. Together they turned their steps across the fields to where the "river" scarcely more than a brook, tumbled over the rocks in its haste to join the large stream beyond. They found a little nook in the rocky wall, where the gray rocks widened slightly to form a grassy lawn, fringed with trees, just unfording their leaves. There was still sufficient hint of a chill in the air to lend sparkle to the sunny warmth and to Halvord, long buried at his desk, and the intricate analysis which formed his work, it seemed as though he had become a boy again as he dug angle-worms with a bit of broken branch and imprinted them in a box.

Never on his fishing trips during vacation time had he enjoyed half the sport with costly rods and reels, that he found in the grumpy length of line which Buster extracted from his pocket. It required some surgical skill to remove the barb of the hook which had fastened itself in the lining and Halvord watched the proceeding with eyes suddenly grown young.

"It was too early in the season for the fish to be finical as to fare, so the worms were more eagerly accepted than the fanciest flies would be early in the season. By noon the two had caught a goodly string, and Halvord, finding a suitable piece of slate in the stream, decided to add some of the fish to their picnic fare, so he built a rude stove with the flat slab of slate for the boiler.

Buster, delighted with this novelty, assisted with a will, and they were so engrossed with their task that neither noticed the approach of a slender, girlish figure, until a laughing voice demanded an explanation of Buster's presence so far from the schoolhouse.

"Here's playing hockey," explained Halvord shamelessly. "Won't you play hockey, too, Miss Bennington? If you will, you may have some of the fish."

"I suppose that I should make Dicky go right to school," she said severely, "but I haven't the heart."

"I should be at work," Halvord admitted, "but, like Buster, I have the fishing fever, and I am a worse truant than he. The morning has been well worth it, though, and there is still the long afternoon."

As he spoke, he deftly lifted other fish from the flat top of the improvised stove and announced that lunch was served. The salt packed for the hard boiled eggs also served to season the fish, and to two of the trio, at least, the exertions of the morning gave added zest to appetite.

Margaret, too, seemed to fall under the spell of the day, and after lunch Halvord resigned his line to her, well content to merely superintend her fishing.

Ever since he had come to Chester he had worshipped Margaret Bennington from afar, but he had absorbing work in hand and had not been able to confect with the younger members of her court. Margaret, on her part, finding Halvord at first decidedly entertaining, had, in pique, decided that he was an old man and oblivious to her many charms. And here she found him as much a boy as her ten-year-old brother. His unexpected enthusiasm and obvious capacity for enjoyment captivated her. It was all so different from the affectation of world-weariness which was the approved pose among the wealthy youth of Chester.

The sun was dropping toward the west before Buster reluctantly wound up his line, and thrust them, all dripping, into his long-suffering pockets. Even then the trio lingered to gather flowers, and it was twilight before they reached the road at last and came to a parting of the ways.

"It has been a most pleasant afternoon," said Margaret as she extended her slim, cool hand to Halvord. "I am very grateful to you."

"It is I who should be grateful," said Halvord, softly, forgetting to re-quish her hand. "May I hope that sometime again--"

"It sets a bad example to Dicky," she said laughingly, "but some Saturday, when he does not have to play truant we may come again."

"Saturday is a long way off; four days," Halvord said dimly. "But it will be next Saturday, will it not?"

"Next Saturday," she promised as she withdrew her hand.

"Gee!" exclaimed Buster as he and Margaret swung down the tree-arched lane, leaving the chemist-author standing, hat in hand. "But I've had a bully day. Arent you glad you came?"

He held up his string of fish, thrilling with pardonable pride.

"I've got a fine catch, too."

The girl looked straight ahead into the purple twilight.

"Yes, Buster dear, I'm glad I came. And I think we made a fine catch."
