

Representation in Industry:

Positive co-operation for industrial progress will be seen to rest on an appreciation of industry as a social service, carrying with it a right of all to progressively share in advance of industry and representation of all who participate, in the control of general policy. This is a question of status.

The organization of industry on a trust basis is almost identical with that of an industry on a national basis. To assume that in the government of the trust there is any more of the human agent than in the government of municipal tramways is the veriest nonsense. The only real difference is that under one the community, either as consumers, rate-payers, or tax-payers, receive first consideration, while under the trust scheme the capitalist's interest is paramount.

Industrial autocracy is an insult to manhood; subordination to the industrial machine an affront to personality. With all its crudeness, Syndicalism, because it ignored the material aspects of the question and fastened on the moral issue, awakened a sympathetic response. The moral motive in trade unionism has grown stronger with every step in the consolidation of capitalism.

Apart from all the effects of the difference of resources at the command of the two, the assumption of superiority by one class and the compulsory concession of it by the other dissatisfaction causes a ~~dissension~~ which divides the world irretrievably into two.
