

Hopkins University for Oxford: "I have had three personal ideals, one to do the day's work well and not bother about tomorrow. . . . The second ideal has been to act the Golden Rule as far as in me lay toward my professional brethren and towards the patients committed to my care. And the third has been to cultivate such a spirit of equanimity as would enable me to bear success with humility, the affection of my friends without pride, and to be ready when the day of sorrow and grief came to meet it with courage befitting a man."

"I have loved no darkness,
Sophisticated no truth,
Nursed no delusion,
Allowed no fears."

Such was Osler, such were his ideals, and nobly did he live up to them.

Although far removed, especially in later years, he never forgot his Alma Mater; he was always endeavouring in one way or another to advance her interests. He was continually giving rare books to the library, or raising money for some object such as making and printing a catalogue of the museum, in which he took intense interest and which contained many of his own specimens. It is not a secret that he has left his magnificent library of rare books and incunabula to the McGill Medical Library and directed that his ashes should be deposited with his books.

Sir William Osler had received many honours from home and foreign lands; he had a hatful of LL.D.s., was honorary member of many foreign societies, was F.R.S. and F.R.C.P., London, and was made a Baronet in 1911.

Sir William was married in 1892 to Mrs. Samuel Gross, née Revere, of Boston, Mass., by whom he is survived. He had one son, who was the joy of his father's heart, having many fine literary tastes, but he, unfortunately, was killed in the war. This blow was a severe one and although Sir William bore up bravely, he never fully recovered from the shock. During the railway strike in England last autumn, Sir William had to take a long drive in bitter weather in a motor, and caught a severe cold; bronchopneumonia developed, then empyema with operation; a few days later he succumbed to sudden hæmorrhage.
