A Japanese Table.

A man who had just reached heaver began to look about him, and before long discovered a pair of human ears. "What are these?" he asked, in amazement. "They are the ears of the people who, when they were on earth heard what they ought to do to be good but did not do it. So when they died the only part of them that came to heaven was their ears."

After the man had gone a little further he saw a heap of strange things, H. J. Stabb & Co. and asked his guide what they were. "They are tongues," was the reply "and they once belonged to the people who were always telling others what they should do to be good, but who never followed their own counsel. So when they died only their tongues ame to heaven."

Losing the "Wine Habit"

Recent British statistics show marked decrease in the consumption of champagne, and this in spite of the reduction in price caused by the removal of the ad valorem duties. The popularity of the less expensive wines continuance of the heavy tax on them. One well-known expert estimates that the quantity of wine drunk in England to-day is only one-third of what it was before the war, and he fears that unless there is a big reduction in restaurant prices we may be in danger of losing the "wine habit" altogether. This is bad news just at a ime when some of the Dominions are making a special effort to push their wines on the British market.

I thought it wasn't strictly wise to roast James Baxter Twigg, for there was brooding in his eyes a spirit strong and big, the soul of one aprili25 m, th, tey who faints and dies before he quits the fig. And so I said to him, "Oh, James, your neighbors make you sore, and jawing gents and doleful dames have made your life a bore; if you would queer their moral games you'll do what they implore. For months they have surrounded you, and raised their daily storm, and tried to pound you black and blue with language rich and warm; I often wonder what they'd do, if haply you'd reform." James Baxter Twigg, he winked three winks, and said, "Your rede is kind, and I'll cut out those the said to accommodate 34 persons, strictly new; 2 Life Boat Compasses, strictly new; 2 Life Boat Compasses, the jig. And so I said to him, "Oh
