CHAPTER IX. Jinny.

I have already mentioned the man whom I secretly looked upon as standing between me and all preferment. He was a good-looking fellow, but he wore a natural sneer which for some reason I felt to be always directed toward myself. This sneer grew pronounced about this time, and that was the reason, no doubt, why I continued to work as long as I did in secret. I dreaded the open laugh of this man, a laugh which always seemed hovering on his lips and which was only held in restraint by the awe we all felt of the major. Notwithstanding, I made one slight move. Encountering the deputy-coloner, I ventured to ask if he was quite satisfied with the evidence collected in the Jeffrey case. His surprise did not prevent him from asking my reasons for this ques-

I replied to this effect: "Because I have a little friend, win-some enough and subtile enough to worm the truth out of the devil. I hear that the girl Loretta is suspected of knowing more about this unfortunate tragedy than she is willing to impart If you wish this little friend of mine to talk to her, I will see that she and does so with effect." The deputy-coroner looked interest-do you mean by little friend and what is her name?" "I will send her to you."

And I did. The next day I was standing on the corner of Vermont avenue when I saw Jinny advancing from the house in K. street. She was chipper, and she was smiling in a way which made me say to myself: 'It is fortunate that Durbin is not

For Jinny's one weakness is her lack of power to hide the satisfaction she takes in any detective work that comes her way. I had told her of this and had more than once tried to impress upon her that her smile was a complete give-away, but I noticed that if she kept it from her lips, it forced its way out of her eyes, and it she kept it out of her eyes, it beamed like an inner radiance from her whole face. So I gave up the task of making her perfect and let her go on smiling, glad that she had such frequent cause for it.

This morning her smile had a touch of pride in it as well as of delight, and noting this, I remarked:

"You have made Loretta talk." Her head went up and a demure dimple appeared in her cheek. "What did she say?" I urged. "What. has she been keeping back?' You will have to ask the coroner. My orders were strict to bring the results of my interview immediately to

MANY TEAMS IN BOTH THE JUNIOR AND SENIOR LEAGUES

in London Is Bright—Clubs in Line,

There will be no dearth of hockey teams in the City League this season from present indications. It is thought that there will be at least six teams in the senior league, and possibly seven. The junior league will also have more teams in it than last year.

So far four junior teams have announced their intention of entering the league. The Saints will have two teams and the Londons and Waterloos will have one each. The latter team will likely be called the Thistle hockey team. In regard to the Waterloos, in general, it might be said that the Thistle Club, where they are located, have provided them with a new training table and done many other things to help them to get into condition.
