I looked from him to the silent figure at his side with wonder. Again she shook her head.

"I can only speak to him through you," she went on in that same low tone; "but you must give him my message, for the sake of the love you bear him. Tell him there is danger before him, and I have come to wars, to entreat him, to delay his journey. He must not go to B.—. There is danger—horrible danger!"

"But we are on our way there now," I said, mystified.

"Turn back, then; oh, make him turn back!" she entreated, stretching out her small white hands imploringly.

"I was dreaming, I believe," he answered in a graver tone: "dreaming of one I can never see again! Bah! what is lift itself but a dream? The past is gone, and she with it; what's the use of thinking of what is past recall?" I asked, and then I told him what had happened. At first he laughed at the ides of a mysterious lady who was so interested in him, and chaffed me unmercifully about my talent for romancing; but as I went on he listened more attentively, and his eyes questioned mine with eagerness.

"Good God! is it possible?" he murmured, and then again he seemed to doubt my veracity.

"Tye been talking in my sleep," he said, "and you've caught a name, It's a bad jest, Tom Leeson, and I'm a bad subject for jesting with, I give you notice. I thought you knew me better by this time, you young scamp!" And, turning away as though to hide the emotion he could not help showing, he pulled out his pipe and began to fill it. I was growing a little hot over it myself by this time. It was hard to have one's word doubted after being startled and almost frightened out of one's senses.

"Believe me or not, as you choose." I responded sulkily. "I've told you just what happened, neither more nor less—except that I asked her to speak to you herself, because you were sure to say you didn't believe me."

"And what did you say? Oh, Tom, if you only knew! How can I believe? I feel as though the earth was reeling under my feet. Tell me quick—every word!" he cried in a hoarse, broken voice.

"She said I was to tell you not to doubt the truth of what the Helen you love says, and if you were still incredulous I was to tell you she showed me her hand!"

"Her hand? Her left hand, was it? And you saw—what?"

"That the first joint of the middle finger was wanting."
