

According to my suggestion, he has the right to refuse or accept. If he accepts, it will be because he finds an interest in doing so. After all, if we can offer the Limit Holder lands elsewhere and, if he is willing to accept them, I do not see why every one would not be contented. No one wants to go in and drive the Limit Holder out. He is an element with which we have to deal and without which in many cases Colonization could not succeed. But in cases where friction is apt to arise I think it would be better for all concerned, if the Settler when taking his lot would know that he is the sole master and that his obligations consist simply in carrying out the requirements of the law. If we can succeed in creating Colonization Reserves, the advantages, as I have stated in my remarks here above, are many and they are as great for the Limit Holder as they are for the Settler.
