

The St. Andrews Standard.

PUBLISHED BY A. W. SMITH.]

ET VARIIS SUMENDUM EST OPTIMUM.—Cic

[52 50 PER ANNUM IN ADVANCE]

No 1

SAINT ANDREWS NEW BRUNSWICK, JAN. 4, 1871.

Vol 38

DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS FOR PALE PEOPLE.
A GREAT REMEDY FOR SUMPTION, as by many prominent physicians to be the cause of various other diseases as RHEUMATISM AND CURS OF ALL COMPLAINTS.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and which, when taken, will result in a speedy cure.

Croup, Bronchitis, Influenza, Cough, Hoarseness, Pain of the Chest and Side, Croup, Whooping Cough,
Liver Complaint, &c.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, man-
ifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, man-
ifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, man-
ifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, man-
ifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, man-
ifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, man-
ifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

It is recommended in the public, manifestations of every form of disease, and
which, when taken, will result in a speedy
cure.

ECHOES OF THE YEAR.

Old year! a right to sing thy parting lay, Than mine demands a bolder minstrelsy;
A surer hand must touch the echoing lyre A sweeter voice, glow with a Sappho's fire.
Yet you to please, I now essay to sing,
To pluck one feather from the muse's wing, To golden ink to dip this pen of mine To fill this page with faded spoils of time.

We've left a mile-stone on time's changing shore, Write for the past, thenceforth—no more.
Old morn, dead flowers, old year, adieu, Our hopes, our hearts are now with thee, the new.
Kind Patrons, may this joyous festive morn, To you of brighter days, be but the dawn; Thy joys unnumber'd for the coming year, Fresh as the leaves of Daphne's deathless vine.
While joy and plenty reign around your hearth, Think of the poor, the needy sons of earth; Ope thy rich store, some generous aid impart—
To cheer the lonely, heal some breaking heart.

O'er our blest land, the land I love to sing, Fair Peace and Plenty stretch their beauteous wing, No conquering armies tramp the hallowed soil,
That yields its fruits to hard and honest toil.
Here all may live unharmed by foreign foes, Secure from strife, and her attendant woes.

See, hence o'er Europe how the War-god flies, And shakes his crimson plumage in the skies.
How shattered hosts in wild-stern havoc lie, How blooms the German Rose, how glides the Flour de Lis.

Awake fair France, thy glittering hosts arise, Arise once more and shake thy passive lyre, Time eagle soaring in days gone by,
Towards victory's crye salute in the sky.
Fear not, for these same trace of ancient worth,
That made thy land of glory hallowed on the earth, Must still remain to animate thy heart, Thy breast to move, thy flagging pulse to start.

Degenerate Spain! can we thy lineage trace,
To that once free, once honored glorious race?
O'er the dread Civil War unfurl thy wing, A nation bat in name—without a King.
How long shall war and her accursed brood Steph thy fair soil in countless seas of blood, Can no remorse ever wash from thee the stain, Can no repentance make thee pure again?

Bright are thy skies, thy land a grave length, Is beauty gone, its very living death, Italia Land whose glorious deeds still live Unquench'd echo through the corridors of time, Awakening echo in the ravished heart, Dreams of the past, which will not hence depart.

Free once again, thy cowering head uprise, Scorn things of earth; look proudly 'towards the skies.
Old England, glorious land, mistress of the sea, My heart I make some song to sing of thee, Thou sea mark standing in the tide of time, Land of all lands for glorious deeds sublime.

Would thy bright glorious record of the past, Could faithful stand and time itself outlast, Once thy strong arm was ever stretch'd to save,
The weak from spoil to shield the vanquished brave, Now thy fair fame is pitted against the stake Of button merchants and a yard of tape, Thou honour sold by Gildstone and his clan, Whose proudest deeds disgrace the name of man.

Is Allion happy in fair France's tears?
Tell not the tale to blushing Europe's ears.
Can she stand still and see the Golden Horn From nervous Turkey's grasp by brigand Russia torn?

Where is the conquering flag she once unfurled?
Its motto freedom, for the wide, wide world; Cold is the heart that unmoved looks on thee Shorn of thy glory and thy chivalry.

The United States claims my attention now To Uncle Sam we make our humble bow, And "cave right in" to Grant and other geese, Whose life-long cackle ends in "let's have peace."
Thou bragging land, where vice is stamped so plain, Great is thy tongue, and little is thy brain.

Old year! deep buried within thy shadowy past, Are lives and deeds too bright alas to last;
How oft we chained as if by magic spell To these soft morn of thy echoing shell.
Out from its depths proceeds a witching strain, Such none ere heard before, such none will hear again.

Catch ye the sound distinct and clear clear?
'Tis Dickens name that thrills thy ravished ear.
Not dead art thou whose truthful, master pen Wrote well the virtues and the faults of men; Whose generous heart beyond ambition's lure, Wrote the sad, simple, annals of the poor.

As long as time, shall thy fair honoured name Stand foremost on the deathless page of fame, A hallowed spot on which to turn the eye,
To know, to feel, that genius cannot die.

It needs no column towering 'toward the skies, No marble slab to point where Dickens lies; Useless the fane, in vain the sculptor's art,
His name is graven on the wide world's heart.

His name is graven on the wide world's heart.

Ye who with sadness on the year look back, See in the past, a dreary barren track, Where brief with grief, has never ceased to blend,
To snatch all joy that happiness could lend.
Whose furrow'd cheek, the path of many a tear, Bears the deep mark of this thy saddest year;
The too plain token of the thoughts that dwell, Lone with thyself in memory's haunted cell.
Take heart, for thee in hope's sweet garden grow, Wreaths for each toil, a charm for every woe; Contentment's pearl in life's sad cup must lay Beneath the bitter draught each mortal drinks away.

My dream is o'er—for you I've strove to sing, An unskilled hand has touched the lyric string; My highest hope is that to you 'twill seem,
A no unpleasant or ungrateful theme.

A NEW YEAR'S STORY.

BY JENNIE BELL.

On a New Year's Eve a little girl might have been seen picking her steps as carefully as she could over the dirty pavement in one of the most populous and crowded lanes of London. Patter, patter, came the rain drops on the little uncovered head; while the thin worn shoes let the wet in at every step. No wonder the poor child shivered, as she saw the shawl cover about her, and walked quickly as she could, wending her way in and out among the groups of wretched-looking children, who in a crowd that proved she had lost the sight of a day or two before.

At last she reached the door of the best looking house in the street, and yet this was all she had with the door off the hinges, and scarce a window but had a stuffing of rags. Mounting to the second story, she opened the door of a small room. The room had little furniture in it, yet, somehow, it had a look of comfort about it, that none of the others had. A piece of faded carpet was neatly spread in the centre of the floor, while a rather worn heart-shaped rug adorned the fireplace. The table at one side of the room boasted a green-and-black checked cover, and the chairs were covered with the same. A few books were tastefully laid out on the table, with the gilt side up, helping, in their quiet way, the adornment of the room. On the hearth sat a pale, delicate boy, trying to burn a bit of wet stick like a pipe, and smoke the little bit; but, on hearing the door open, he sprang to his feet, saying—'Have you come home, Maggie?' and what have you got for supper?

'Have patience, James,' Maggie answered, with a sad smile as she wearily drew a stool near to the fire and sat down. But James was hungry, and he couldn't wait; so he began to take out the contents of the basket. First came a loaf of bread, then butter, a few eggs, and some coffee. Poor James! how his eye brightened as he saw the eggs! Not for months had he tasted an egg, and these looked so fresh—so unlike London eggs—that he could hardly wait until they were cooked.

Slipping off her wet shoes, Maggie got a pair of dry stockings—a good deal too large, to be sure—but they were dry; and the color came into her cheeks a little as she stood before the fire making the coffee. Child as she was, once she had seen the coffee, she must have had careful training.
Her setting of the table was so neat! the books were taken off the little table, then the green-and-black cover was carefully folded; and a white towel, a little bread-bare, was spread. The cups and saucers, bread and butter, did look very inviting, so tastefully were they arranged. By this time James had boiled the eggs to perfection.
They sat down, but did not begin to eat, as many children would have done, until Maggie had said her little grace—taught her long ago by her mamma. After tea, Maggie told James of her walk; how, as she was carrying a book to exchange for food at the grocer's, she was knocked down by a gentleman who was turning the corner of a street, and not hearing her soft footstep, the result was a collision. 'When I fell,' Maggie continued, 'I must have struck my head on the corner of the pavement, for I remembered nothing more until I opened my eyes in a druggist's shop; and such a pleasant-looking gentleman was holding a glass of water to my lips.'

As I looked up he smiled, and asked me if I was hurt; and in such a kind tone, and in a voice so like mamma's, that I burst into tears.
As soon as I could speak, I told him my story.
I told him also about our home, and you, and the kind greener that took care of us, and the thing we wished to exchange for food. After seeing me get these things at the grocer's, he walked with me to the head of the street, and where I lived, and when he said 'good-by,' he glipped a half crown into my hand, promising to come and see me tomorrow. The gentleman was so kind, brother, I could not help thinking of the angels mamma used to tell us about—who sometimes in disguise go about the world helping God's children out of their difficulties.

After clearing the table and putting away the dishes, Maggie drew her little brother down on the hearth rug to talk about papa and mamma who were in heaven. Wise little Maggie, but a child yourself, and yet trying to fill a mother's place to your little brother!
But she had known what sorrow was, and trouble had made her wise beyond her years.

I don't believe God will help us, said James.
Before mamma died, she said that God would send some one to take care of us, and it's over so long since then, and nobody has come yet.
Hush, replied Maggie, don't you know God hears every word we say, and maybe papa and mamma too? Perhaps Uncle James may come to-morrow; only it is strange he has not written. Nearly a year since mamma wrote to him, and a letter does not take six months to go from England to Australia.

Suppose uncle should be dead, Maggie, or your letter had gone down to the bottom of the sea, like the ship, you were telling me of a few days ago.

Well, if it did, replied the brave girl, God will find some other way of answering our prayers; for don't you remember she often said 'No mother's prayers would go unanswered'?

Well, all I wish, James answered, is that mamma had taken me with her. I never would be hungry in heaven, and everything is so beautiful there! the streets all gold, instead of greasy mud like London; and the people that dwell there dressed in white, with their hairs shining all day long.

But then James, it was not God's will to take you then; and who knows what great work He has for you to do? You know mamma said—God has a work for each of His children to do in this world, and we must be true and trust in Him that all will come right.
Can you say the verse about the orphan's stay and God's promise to be a Father to the fatherless?

'Oh yes, Maggie, I can say them both. But do you think papa and mamma will be angry if they know what I did?'

About that, dear?
Not angry, but grieved, dear James, as they would if they saw your boy doing wrong, and Maggie patted the thin cheek, and stroked the curly hair, till James's eyes were nearly closed in sleep.

Just then a light knock came to the door, and the kind-hearted Irish woman who lived in the room below, entered saying, with a smile, Sure it's good luck that is come to you children, to-night; for here's a basket for 'Miss Maggie George,' the man said; and I'm sure it's plenty there for you.

For me, Mrs. Brady said Maggie. Then it must be from the kind gentleman I met when I was out. Oh, how good, now kind of him! But it is from our Heavenly Father, after all, Mrs. Brady; for it is He that puts it into the hearts of people to do kind things.

It's yourself that's always right, honny, and I'm after thinking the same. I had better take off the cover for you, for them little littles of yours will never unfasten those hard knights. And sure enough it was a serious matter; but this only prolonged the pleasure.

The children who read this story cannot know the joy of opening a basket like this, because you, perhaps, never missed a dinner in your life; and, unlike our young friends, you have many kind relatives who always provide a nice dinner for New Year's Day.
When the cover was fairly off James danced about the floor for joy. Just fancy, two large chickens; ready cooked; with a bun and a plum pudding; and a pair of warm shoes for each of them! Was there ever anybody so kind as this unknown gentleman? James was the first to speak.

Maggie, I'll always trust in God. Mamma knew best.

I'm just as glad as if it was for myself, childer, said Mrs. Brady.

A part of it has come for you, dear Mrs.
Brady, said Maggie, putting her arms around the kind-hearted woman's neck. You can have one chicken; and you will boil the pudding, and your children shall have a feast for one New Year's day. But for to-night the basket goes under the table.

Good night, my dears, and the Lord be with you; and with tears of joy in her eyes Mrs. Brady closed the door.

Maggie and James talked a good while about the gentleman who had been so generous, wondering if he would come on the morrow. But nothing could keep James's eyes open much longer; so Maggie and he knelt down by the bedside, and thanked God for his love for them, and his care over them—not forgetting to pray that Uncle James would come home soon.

Next morning they were up before it was light, for London is often dark on New Year's morning. They had breakfast and then Maggie set to work to make the room as neat as possible, feeling sure the gentleman would come. James, meanwhile, read his lesson, for his sister taught him every morning, as her mamma used to; then they dressed themselves carefully, putting on their new shoes. Mrs.
Brady had the pudding in the pot, sometime before. So they had leisure to do as they liked; often Maggie gathered the little children in the stair, and took them up to a garret room that she kept clean, and seating them on the floor, she would sing them a hymn, then make them repeat a verse after her, till they knew it thoroughly, until by this time they could sing several hymns very nicely. Maggie did this partly because she was so fond of singing hymns, and then she knew she was doing good, keeping the little ones out of the chief, and teaching them some thing about Jesus and heaven; doing this the forenoon slipped away. Then came dinner, Maggie and James taking it with Mrs. Brady's family, that the little ones might get a larger share. The dinner was very pleasant one, far pleasanter than many a rich child's for it was a feast to children who seldom got enough even of the coarsest food.

An hour after 12 o'clock and still no sign of the gentleman. Maggie's head had been out of the window for the fifth or sixth time, when she saw a figure turning the corner, that she thought was the person she watched for. No coaxing on James' part would induce Maggie to let him have one peep; it wouldn't be polite Maggie thought, to be seen watching; yet she had the door open long before Mr. Howard reached the top of the stair. Something seemed to affect the gentleman very much as he entered the room, for he could scarce greet his young friends for a minute or two. Maggie thought he was even more like mamma in daylight, but said nothing when she drew the chair near the fire.

No this is your home and this your brother, Maggie, said Mr. Howard as he patted James' curly head. The child was quite at home at once with this kind friend and clattered away, talking him for his present and such warm words, and the boy stopped.

What is it my boy?
Maggie says I have in reason to thank you for putting it into your heart to send the basket.

Quite right, child; your sister knows who cares for the orphan.

As he put his arms round the little girl, he asked her if she could tell him about their former life; how they lived, and about her mamma.

I can tell you it all sir—for after papa died, mamma used to talk to me of her early days.
You know it was a comfort to her to talk to me. We were not always so poor, and mamma was a lady; she could speak two or three languages, and long ago when we had a piano she sang so beautifully. Mamma said she had displeased her friends by marrying papa, who was poor, he was an artist, and if he had kept strong, would have had plenty of money.

Grandma died before mamma married, and grandpa was proud and thought mamma had thrown herself away, and he would not help us, although we wrote to him when papa took ill. Mamma always said that if her only brother was in Australia, knew how poor we were, he would help us; but we could not get his address until just before mamma died, and we have got to go straight on with my story. I got on very well for a few years after he married, and we lived in a pretty house, just out of London—and we had a garden and kept a servant, and papa was much looked up to, because of his talent, mamma said. Just after this papa took cold, and not being strong, it settled on his lungs. The doctor said that we must rest, and a change to some warm climate would restore him; but then we had only a little money laid past, and papa wouldn't take that, although mamma urged him to do so.

He would say, 'What are you to live on, if I take that Maggie? No, if it's God's will He will restore me to health again; but it hadn't been God's will, you see, sir, for papa got gradually worse, although he lingered on some four years able to earn enough to and again to keep us in food. We removed to a smaller house in London for it was too far papa to walk in and out, and he could not afford a conveyance. Oh, how sad it made mamma to see papa wander away, and she made to obey the doctor's order! But papa never grumbled.
He used to say, 'It is darkest before the dawn, dear,' and mamma explained afterwards, that he meant—'The brightness of heaven would make up for the darkness here.' Sometimes papa would wish he had left mamma in her comfortable home; but mamma said she preferred poverty with him, and God would provide for the future. Shortly after papa died, Mamma and he often spoke of the parting, but far often of the meeting again; and mamma would say—'It won't be a long separation, Henry; then we will have an eternity to spend together.' The night papa died, he asked James and me to sit on the side of the bed, and then he spoke to us, oh! so solemnly! I of the way we were to live so as to meet him in heaven, and how kind we were to be to dear mamma! Then he prayed so beautifully that God would comfort us when he was gone, and bring us all together at last in the heavenly mansions.

After the funeral expenses were paid, we removed to two small rooms, but in a respectable locality. Mamma got fine sewing to do, and I helped as much as I could. But then mamma hadn't enough sewing, and then we had less and less to live on. Mamma never complained, but grew pale and thin, and could not eat much; but some-times I thought she could have eaten, but did not want to take any for fear James and I hadn't enough. If a day by, mamma didn't feel strong; the constant sitting caused a pain in her side, and she found she couldn't sew so much.

The rent of the two rooms was more than we could pay, so we came to this room just two years ago. Mamma lived a year here, but she was never able to do much, and so papa's watch had to be sold, and, being a good one, it brought us enough of money to keep us nearly a year; and since then we have just had to sell things bit by bit, to get food.
Mamma tried to get well for our sake, but she could get well in this little room? But from the first, mamma knew her trouble would end in death. All this time she was teaching us, especially out of the Bible, telling us how much Jesus loved us, and that He would raise us from the dead when she was away. Then she would pray with us, and often, at night, I heard her asking God to care for her dear children. Before she died, she wrote to Uncle James, telling him to be a father to us, Grandpa died some years before, and left all he had to uncle; so Uncle James is very wealthy—but then he is in Australia, and we haven't had any answer to the letter mamma wrote. I can hardly bear to tell you of mamma's last moments, sir—it's so hard, even yet —but she died so happy! Her last words were—'Children follow Jesus.' I was alone with her when she died; but I wasn't afraid —she was so pleasant, and the neighbors were kind.

Here poor Maggie's voice failed, and the tears would come; Mr. Howard and James wept too. Maggie was the first to speak: I am sorry I have made you sad, sir; but I'm sure mother's prayers will be answered, and Uncle James will come home soon.

Yes, my darling, said Mr. Howard, 'she will and he has come, for I am your Uncle James; and he clasped them in his arms, and wept over them, and their sad story.
When somewhat recovered from their surprise, Mr. Howard told them of his having replaced several hundred miles further from the place he formerly lived in, and so their letter had lain in the post office for months; but as soon as he'd get it, he started at once for England. The night before he was out searching for them, when he suddenly came against Maggie, whose name and history, among them sure he had found his nephew and niece. Mr.
Howard accepted the precious legacy with joy, and they were now his adopted children.

What a happy New Year this has been after all, Uncle James, said Maggie, as on New Year's night they were snugly seated in an alcove room at their tea.

Now that the orphans were rich, they did not forget their poor friends. Mrs. Brady was well cared for; and often Maggie delighted old neighbors with a visit, always bringing them some comfort.

I wonder if any of the children who read the DOMINION MONTHLY ever think of the orphans who have no kind friends to provide comforts for them at Christmas and New Year's time. And I wonder if they ever think what a profitable way it would be to spend some of their pocket money in buying comforts for some poor little ones! Wouldn't it be worth while to see the pale faces brighten with pleasure, and to hear the mother's 'God bless you?' And better still, to hear your Heavenly Father's voice, saying—'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of my children, ye have done it unto me.'—[New Dominion Monthly, for Jan.]

VALUE OF REVACCINATION IN SMALL-POX.
Most of our readers are aware of the extent to which the small-pox has ravished France, and especially Paris, and of the continued discussion of remedies and indications of the disease. In response to a request from the Minister of the Interior to the Imperial Academy of Medicine the following statement of established facts was returned: First, vaccination is a preventative against small-pox; second, in every instance, after a certain time, revaccination is expedient to secure complete exemption from contagion; third, revaccination is an absolute security from danger; fourth, revaccination is useful at all ages; fifth, it can be employed without inconvenience during the existence of the epidemic, and it is perfectly well established that in certain localities—in the bosom of families, in boarding-schools, and other agglomerations of individuals—it has succeeded in arresting upon the spot an epidemic just begun; sixth, the actual epidemic of small-pox, which prevails in Paris and other points of French territory, has supplied a most convincing proof of the protective power of revaccination; finally, it was stated that in various army corps, and especially in the Gards de Paris, and in many public and private establishments, particularly in some of the municipal schools, the small-pox was easily checked after revacination; and also that the latest statistics, especially those collected in the civil hospitals of Paris, prove in the most positive manner that persons who re-vaccinate

(Continued on fourth page.)