

For all our modern civilization and supposed sophistication, we have yet to master the crust on which a very significant proportion of the world's population depends.

men for offloading meant a former inhabitant no longer missing.

The question, "When will it erupt again?", has already been answered. Taal remained quiet from September 30, 1965 until the fifth day of July, 1966, when it erupted again on the rim of the 1965 crater. This time, however, there was no loss of life, the inhabitants having been evacuated beforehand from the affected area after a warning of approximately two months.
