Charlottetown, P. E. Istand, Wednesday, July 30, 1856

With DEATH TN THE CAR With my hand close pressed by a friend, I bade him good-bye, and spraug upon the platform as the ears weve crowded. Each seat was full; and at the first stopping place, a large number of new passengers got on, standing up argind the stove or leaning against the seats in the passageway. Every window was elosed, and the stove glowing red with heat. The air was close, oppresisive, almost suffocating. The strong appd nauseating stench of rum and tobacee "fusion" seemed to gather like a vapor of miasma between us and the dimly vapor of miasma between us and the dimly burning lamps. We had been dozing, but awoke with a choking sensation. The some one afraid of God's pure air. Not wishing to commit the impropriety of letting fresh air in too suddenly upon the fragrant embodiment of personal filth which had embodiment of personal filth which had been lodged upon the other half of our seat, three young ones more so, and staggered three young ones more so, and staggered out upon the platform. When we returned to our seat, we found that an Irishman and two strapping boys had been practising "squatter sovereignty" upon our robes and seat, and excluded us from the territory. Near the middle of the car was an invalid $-a$ consumptive from the land of goldgoing home to die. With gasping movements he attempted to raise the window, but he had not sufficient strength to do so. Promptly putting our hand upon the catch, we lifted the sash as high as it would go. Like a child thirsting for water he raised his hat and leaned forward to catch a his faded cheek. "Tr." he said feebly, "Thank you, sir," he said feebly, and turned his languid eye gratefully upon us. "That is so blessed-I was nearly fainting." "We can't have that window up," growled a surly old passenger, who looked as though he had vitality enough to withstand any storm.
"Putit down, sir,

She quickly came forward and peered into the face of the sick man. She started as though a corpse had met her gaze. A strange, peculiar feeling thrilled over us as strange, peculiar feeling thrilled over us as the hat gently from the sleeper's brow, and looked again.
" $\mathrm{No}^{\text {" }}$ she murmured, " it cannot be." The sleeper's arm lay out over the end of the seat, and upon one of the bony finzers a heavy diamond ring glittered in the light of her lamp. She saw the gem, and light of her lamp. She saw the gem, and she pressed the ring it opened, and she saw her own miniature-her gift to her boy when he went from home. You are home him! Wake up, Howard! Buriage waits." ${ }^{0}$.", God be praised! The But the boy did not wake even at the his head tenderly from our shoulders, he fell forward heavily into our arms. made aware of the terrible truth-so full nade aware of the terrible truth-so full of heartbroken agony-will not be forgotten for many a day. She swooned and fell heavily upon the floor.
We carried out the wasted form of the sleeper, and then the insensible mother. Fast and hotly our tears fell as we straightened out the attenuated limbs of the consumptive, for we thought of the mother's sumptive, for bitter waking.
The sick one, wandering back over land and sea to die at hume, did not have far to go. His mother was in waiting, but did ot see hin alive. He was taken to his carriage
