The One O'Clock Luncheon.

BY H. L. RANN.

The one o'clock luncheon is a species of social liquidation with which women pay their debts of the previous ten years and cause their husbands to groan audibly in the neighborhood of the check book. One of these luncheons will usually hold a large family for quite an extended period, as for two days previous everybody in the house is obliged to eat in the kitchen and listen to the hired girl as she assaults the tinware.

In order to give an afternoon luncheon properly it is necessary to re-paper the house and have the hardwood floors varnished by an aromatic mechanic. After this is done, the dog usually manages to lie down full length in the varnish and transfer most of it to the furniture. If he should overlook this, the children will attend to it for him.

The object of the luncheon is to enable the invited guests to spring their fall clothes. There is no place in the world where a woman can introduce a new fall suit and hear more sotto voce comments on the fit than at one of those gatherings. Some luncheon guests become so expert that they can tell at a glance whether the suit was bought of a mail order house or was built by a home architect.

Luncheons are generally followed by music by some visiting vocalist who does not tire easily and who introduces some rag-time effects into a series of Schumann songs. When this ordeal is over, the guests get out their embroidery and punch monograms into the table linen, sofa pillows and other lingerie.

The conversation at a luncheon ranges from Shakespeare to soup, and becomes more or less critical when the hostess is out of the room. Sometimes bridge whist is played for a souvenir spoon, bearing a picture of the court house or the new Presbyterian Church.

Luncheons are hard upon husbands, who have to curl their legs around a lunch counter stool and pretend to like it. Every husband, however, wants to see his wife in the social swim, if it makes him a dyspeptic for life.
