STEAM-PLOUGHING IN ENGLAND

Whatever may be the objections to the use of the steam-ploughs—and they are fast being overcome—they impress the unaccustomed visitor with great force. I had read of them and From the Philadelphia Record.)

quate had been my preconceived idea concerning them.

John Fowler and Co., of Leeds, show several sets of apparatus with engines of from six to twenty nominal horse power, with the gang-ploughs, grubbers, rollers, cultivators, and harrows to be used with them. It would be impossible to give a correct notion of the system of steam cultivation with impossible to give a correct notion of the system of steam cultivation without quite full illustrations. In Fowler's system two engines are used—engines which are capable of travelling on the road, moving about the fields, and carrying their apparatus with them. Under the boiler a horizontal drum carries a steel wire rone, by which the ries a steel wire rope, by which the plough is drawn. The plough which turns from four to eight furrows, according to the power of its engine, is a good and holy man, and who was hor-cording to the power of its engine, is a good and holy man, and who was hor-creating to the power of its engine, is a good and holy man, and who was hor-creating the charge. cording to the power of its engine, is a gang of ploughs attached to an iron frame, and so balanced that as it proceeds in either direction the gang which is to make the reverse cut is cocked up in the air. The ploughman sits over the centre of the gang, and has in front of him a steering windlass, by which the direction of the plough is regulated. The grubbers, cultivators, harrows, subsoilers, etc., are all arranged in a similar way.

When at work one, engine stands at each side of the field, each with its

When at work one engine stands at each side of the field, each with its rope attached to the plough, and this is drawn backward and forward between them, the engines moving forward along the headland for each new bite. In order to protect the rope from friction, it is supported here and there by little tracks called "rope porters."

A pair of the larger engines and a six-furrow plough will turn up from fifteen to twenty acres per day, almost irrespective of depth, within any usual other direction.

'Hold on!' cried Reilly. 'The last time you saw me, you said: "Reilly, watch and pray," iddn't you?'

'Yes,' added the chaplain.

'Well, I did watch, and I prayed, and I prayed and watched, and the first answer that came to my prayer was Reilly's answer.
