Are you a Candidate?

"I've been a member of the Academy Club only a year, and now I'm a candidate for president," announced Roy to his family, with an air meant to be imposing.

"Are you a candidate, a real candidate, my son?" asked his father.

"Why, my name's been proposed for the office, and that makes me one, doesn't it, father?" asked Roy in turn.

"I wondered if you knew what the word candidate once meant," said Mr. Grayson. "It comes from the same root as 'candid,' which means 'glowing white,' and a candidate ought to be a person in every way honest, clear as light. In old Roman times a candidate was known as a man in white. He was obliged to wear a white toga if he sought office, and this was supposed to stand for his character."

"I guess candidates now-a-days are not all of them men in white," said Richard, laughing.

"They ought to be," returned Mr. Grayson with spirit. "So, boys, look out for yourselves. Whenever you wish any good position, or have any special place in view, remember what the word means and ask yourselves, each of you, 'Am I a candidate—a man in white?'"—Boys and Girls.
