

early shipments, will be unprecedented. There is every reason for the assumption that the potato crop of the United States will be as large this season, and with the single exception of last season, as ever before. The potato buyers, who at this season of the year purchase their winter supply, and those speculators who make potatoes their special study, seem to think that there will be all the potatoes this season that can be marketed at moderate prices. Hundreds of canal boats are now being loaded along the canals of the Delaware and Hudson Companies, at prices that will admit of their sales in this city in December at $1.50 per barrel and give to the speculator a very nice profit. There was a very earnest effort on the part of many onion growers to sell their crop early this season and prices have been very low. Onions will, however, be abundant, but will probably sell for a little more this winter than they did last. New York Times.
