

above that sees into their depths, and to him leave the judgment ; well dost thou know this. Were man to inscribe on his brow the decalogue—were this encircled by the golden rule—were he to write on his door-posts lessons of duty—were he, as the ancient Jews, to cover his garments with the phylacteric expression of his motives—yet would he meet his neighbour, who, after reading the comprehensive law of truth and of love, would wilfully be blind to the wisdom of Christianity, and would knowingly transgress all its teachings. Speak not, then, Philo-Medicus, of man's motives ; when you have seen a flood-tide of malevolence flowing in a constant stream, then do thou oppose thy barrier—the under-currents are beneath thy ken.

We wish to part with thee in all kindness, and recommend to thyself our sober feeling—depending, perhaps, as thou hast asserted, on want of modesty. When we read thy first epistle, we laughed and quoted invidiam virtute partam, gloriam non invidiam putarem. We sat down and writ thee our crustulum in about ten minutes ; on the advent of thy last we again had a philosophic saw—summa petit livor—perflant altissima venti,—even thou shouldst have had some of this resignation—Vale, Philo-Medice ; Ride si sapis.

---

We apologize to our readers for again occupying so much space with Philo-Medicus. His letters have been published in the Courier of this city, and feeling that we held communion solely with our subscribers respecting the matter at issue, we preferred allowing his last letter to remain unnoticed till this month, feeling assured that the cause would remain unaffected, and our remarks in the September number would be judged by the Faculty at large at the standard they merited. The answer, it will be seen, is more in pity than in anger, and partaking nothing of the character of Fabian warfare. We promise that this will be the last.

---

The Lecturers at the College of Medicine commenced their labours for the present session on Tuesday, the 1st of October last, by delivering introductory lectures in their respective departments.