ly

m ed

a-

er, n-

at of

d,

he

in

se its

in

rst

la, si-

is

ei-

en

les

ts. in

nd

who, after their arrival in the country, had been annually seized with obstinate agues, may now be seen, even at an advanced period of life, actively employed with their numerous offspring in the cultivation of their farms.

VI. It is not my intention to descend into minute particulars concerning the Indians of Upper Canada. I shall neither designate each nation by its appropriate appellation, nor delineate those peculiarities of character by which the individuals of one nation may be distinguished from those of another.

To observe a number of different Indian tribes, headed by their respective chiefs, and assembled together from the most remote parts of the province, to co-operate with a regular army in the defence of their territories, is certainly a new and entertaining sight. The Indians of Upper Canada bear a striking resemblance to those who inhabit the other parts of North America, nay even to