

Thou lingerest still by stream and lake—
 Though drenched with chilling foam,
 Ah ! 'tis most trying to forsake
 A home,—though chang'd and sad, still home
 And thou, though leaf and shrub are sere
 Still lov'st thy stony fountain here.

Management of Horses in Case of Fire.—It is well known that, when a fire happens in a stable such is the natural dread of the horse, that he cannot be prevailed on to move out of danger, but remains to his certain destruction. In this alarming case it has been recommended, and in a few instances practised with success, the opportunity of a few minutes offering, to blind the horses with any cloths which can be suddenly laid hold on, and a bridle or halter also being put on, to back them out; for it seems, when these animals see or smell fire, they obstinately refuse to move forward, but may be forced backward. It is obvious that there are too many desperate cases, in which no opportunity can be had for this practice; on the other hand, during the hurry and confusion of a fire it may not occur, even when such an opportunity may be instantaneously present, whence it is worthy of memorandum and recollection.—Adams's Horsemanship.

Slap Jucks.—Mix one pint of Indian meal and four spoonful of flour with one quart of new milk; add four eggs and a little salt. Bake on a griddle as buck wheat cakes, and serve hot with fresh butter.
