

A PILOT'S TREASURY.

AN ENCOUNTER WITH THE PIRATES OF MALACA.

The main body of the pirates, who were evidently intending to board us on the port, advanced exceedingly slowly, delaying their progress until their confederates, who were to strike at other portions of the ship, had reached the positions for which they had set out, and a long and fierce shout echoed across the water, which caused a grand rush of all the boats for our vessel. On they came, brandishing their weapons and yelling like fiends incarnate. It was a moment of terrific danger, and the men on the ship, who had not yet set out, were now in a desperate struggle to reach the vessel. The pirates, on the other hand, were equally determined to board us, and the result was a desperate struggle. The pirates, on the other hand, were equally determined to board us, and the result was a desperate struggle. The pirates, on the other hand, were equally determined to board us, and the result was a desperate struggle.

A heavy charge of grape created terrible havoc among the occupants of two of the advancing boats, but it did not serve to retard the progress of the others. The pirates, on the other hand, were equally determined to board us, and the result was a desperate struggle.
