His Eminence Cardinal Logue.

On His Return from Rome, is Presented with an Address and a Pair of Handsome Carriage

His Eminence Cardinal Logue, Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of All Ireland, from his visit to the Eternal City ad limina Apostolorum whither he had been, it will be remembered, from October last, the faithful and devoted people of the archdiocese, were eager to accord to his Eminence an early earnest of their joy in seeing him in their midst again, and this commendable spirit found expression in an address and presentation. The address was designed and executed by the pupils

His Eminence in reply to the address referred to the great work of the renovation of St. Patrick's Cathedral. He said in part:—

It was a time also of consolations, because I happened to be in Rome during the closing weeks of the Jubilee, and it was certainly a delight and a consolation to anyone at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of this 20th century to see so much faith and piety and fervour still flourishing among the members of Christ's flock. To be sure, side by side with that fervour there are very serious drawbacks. We find side by side with the most ardent devotion and the most lively faith the traces of unhappy people who are exerting themselves to the utmost to destroy the faith and underwine even the morality of the faith the traces of unhappy people who are exerting themselves to the utmost to destroy the faith and undermine, even the morality of the people, but still on balancing the disagreeables with the agreeables, it was both a pleasure and a consolation to have been able to witness such a grand and magnificent outburst of Christian faith and Christian feling. I had another consolation also, that of hearing so often from the lips of the sovereign pontifi those expressions of affection and esteem and admiration which he has ever entertained for his Irish children. He has never lost an opportunity when I had the great privilege of speaking to him even for a few moments of saying some words about Ireland, and when he spoke of Ireland his face lit up and his eyes shone and his tongue became eloquent. On the very last occasion when I went to take leave of him he kept me there for half an hour, and during that half hour he occupied my attention in listening to the strongest and most fervent expressions of affection and admiration for the Catholic people of Ireland.

In referring to the Coronation requires at their hands.

To referring to the Coronation on this Eminence said: At a meeting like this, which is more or less of a family gathering, it might be out of place to refer to any subjects of general interest, though I am not surprised that you, as fervent Irish Catholics, should have taken occasion in your address to make a protest against one of the greatest insults that has been offered to our holy Faith in the present generation. I refer to the blasphemous and insulting oath which was forced upon his Majesty the King by the remnant—one of the last remnants—of a barbarous code, and I say advisedly it was forced upon him. I don't believe the King has any sympathy with this barbarous declaration launched against so many of his faithful subjects and I have reason for saying so, and it is a natural inference. He has been before the public as Prince of Wales for a long time—as long a time—as most of them remembered—and I do not believe that there could be found on record one public expression or one public at of his which would be calculated to give pain or offence to any of his future subjects and, as we may be sure, that amiable disposition has not changed with his advent to the throne. We may take we may be sure, that amiable disposition has not changed with his advent to the throne. We may take it for granted that this declaration which he had to make, being a Constitutional Sovereign, in obedience to that barbarous law, was made very much against his inclination.

I can tell you—because I had the opportunity of seeing people from many lands and hearing their views, I can tell you that that very declaration shocked the whole of Christendom, not merely those who are members of the Catholic Church, but those who are outside the Church, belonging to other Christian Combellonging the Christian Christian Combellonging the Christian Combellonging the Christian Christian Combellonging the Christian Christian Combellonging the Christian Christian Combellonging the Christian Christian Christian Combellonging the Christian Christian reverence for the Holy Mother of God that we have, still they regard it as a remnant of barbarism. That an insult such as this which has been offered to his Catholic subjects should be the first act of a Monarch ascending the Throne.

However, we have received some consolation in this matter from the leader of the House of Commons. It may be a consolation to old people like myself, who do not expect to see another reign; perhaps it is not such a consolation to the young people, but he has assured us that we would not get this slap in the face again during the reign of the present monarch. It is something to be thankful for. I suppose we must be grateful for small mercies, and that, as far as I can see, is the only concession that has been made up to the present to Catholic feeling.

Touching on the death of the Queen his Eminence said: During my absence, among other things which took place in the country was the death of the Queen. The country was deprived of a very great and very good Sovereign, a lady who ruled over a large Empire for years, and was a model of a constitutional sovereign, and she certainly was a model and good Christian matron, and it was only natural that on the occasion of her death that there should be grief amongst her subjects. There was real sorrow amongst her Catholic subjects, but it did not appear to satisfy some of those in England and Ireland. I have nothing to say to English Catholics in Ireland. Someone sent me a copy of the "Irrish Times," on the principle, I suppose, that when a person is a bused in a newspaper, it would be a sad thing to let it escape his notice. There are in that paper a series of letters purporting to be signed by-Catholics, complaining that we did not show our grief on the death of the Queen by violating the at whe reletter since expressing his disgust at this declaration forced from the King. Another letter was from one who I believe is an ex-member of the Papal Brigade, censuring the Archbishop of Dublin and myself and all the other Bishops simply because On the occasion of the return of of the Sacred Heart Convent, and is a beautiful specimen of art. In ad-dition to the address a pair of handbishop of Dublin and myself and all the other Bishops simply because we would not make a mere instrument of religion and the most sacred things in religion for the purpose of political manifestation. Now, when a person is attacked it is but natural that he should feel indignation against these writers. I feel there was a very serious want under which they labored, and that was the want of a good sound course of Butler's Catechism. (Applause.) They may be very accomplished gentlemen, but they are very ignorant Catholics—(applause)—and I often find that to be the case. On one occasion I remember a leading Catholic and a good Catholic—a practical Catholic and frequent communicant—who on a public occasion made an assertion connected with Catholic practices that if a child preparing for Confirmation gave me the same answer I would "spin" him—(laughter)—and would not confirm him. Those are the people who write letters and teach the Bishops their duty, and what the love of religion, the law of society, and the law of patriotism requires at their hands.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY IN SCOT-LAND.

From our exchanges we learn that it has seldom happened, within the last twenty years, at any rate, that St. Patrick's day has been held with such whole hearted fervour throughout Scotland as it has been this year. Of course, in all the churches in the land references were made to the great saint, for there is not a church in however remote a corner it may be situated but has its quota of faithful followers of the saint. In Glasgow the streets looked a moving mass of shamrocks, due largely, no doubt to the happy idea of some of the rectors of the churches, who arranged for the distribution of shamrocks to the congregations as they From our exchanges we learn that passed out at the various services. As usual the festival was held both religiously and politically, but in both cases there seemed to be nothing left undone to pay due honor to the saint.

At St. Andrew's Cathedral, Glasgow, the whole Chapter assisted at the mass, whilst His Lordship Bishop Maguire preached the panegyric, in the course of which he contrasted the striking similarity between the mission which the saint had to perform and the mission which his followers had to carry out in this country. They had to live amongst a people wealthy, intelligent, and cultivated—a people who had religion, one that was quickly dwindling into indifference and unbelief. The Catholic religion was still by law publicy insulted, whilst the followers of the Protestant religion were ashamed that their ruler was obliged to so degrade himself as to say a thing which he did not believe. They had nothing but sympathy and pity for the man who believed that what he was expected to say was untrue, yet had not the courage to refuse to do so.

The political demonstration at which Messrs. T. P. O'Connor, Cullinane, and Flavin, M.P.'s, spoke was the largest seen in Glasgow for some twenty years. The Wellington Palace, where the demonstration was held, was crowded to its fullest capacity, and there were as many turned from the doors as were packed in the hall. The resolutions were proposed in English by Mr. Hugh Murphy, and seconded in the "grand old tongue" by Mr. Denis Brogan, president of the Gaelic League.
