NORAH CUSHALEEN OR THE HAUNTED CASTLE.

"What is it? what is it?" asked every one at the excited old man.
 "It's Miss Mary, sir," he gasped, turning to Hargreave.
 "Oh, what of her?" asked the latter, at once getting alarmed.
 "This is her marriage night, sir."
 "Her marriage night!" echoed the youth, staggering back.
 "Oh, masha, cried Michael, 'I didn't believe it myself till old Paddy O'Flin—that's Father Brannagin's servant—told me. He was going up to cleanse the chapel, and light it up for the ceremony."
 "But not for Mary Kendal's marriage?" exclaimed Hargreave.
 "Proth and it is for her, and no other colleen," replied Michael.
 "Married! and to whom?"
 "To Mither Malvrin Blantire, uv course."
 "What! another attempt to force her to the odious union?" cried the youth.
 "Paddy says there's no force at all, at all. Miss Mary is to be married with her own consent."
 "She fickle, changeable!—I will not believe it," exclaimed Hargreave. "No, if there's truth in the story at all, it is another vile plot to destroy her. But she shall be saved once and for all. I will claim her as my wife before them all, and denounce the villain at the very altar."
 "I will go with you," said Norah, in a tone of quiet resolution.
 "You shall," said Hargreave. "I will protect you from the cruelty of your seducer. Where is this marriage to be celebrated?"
 "At Father Brannagin's church, at three o'clock," replied Michael.
 "I'll take ye to it," cried Terry.—"Praise to the Virgin, we are in time."
 It was arranged that Michael should remain in the ruin with Amelia and Norah's child, and that the others should descend to the valley, and proceed to the solitary chapel where the marriage was about to be performed.
 "In a few minutes Norah was ready, and they departed and went at a rapid pace down the slope, Hargreave being fear ul lest they should be too late.

CHAPTER XXXIII—AN EXCITING SCENE AT FATHER BRANNAGIN'S CHAPEL.

Father Brannagin's chapel stood upon an eminence surrounded by trees, at no great distance from the principal entrance to Kendal Castle; but inasmuch as it was several hundred yards from the public road, and approached by a path which led no where else, it was, in its isolation, solitary and secluded.
 The night being cloudy, it was quite dark when Hargreave and his party came in front of the edifice which was considerably larger than one would have thought necessary for the district. They had walked rapidly from the ruin and it still wanted a few minutes of the hour at which the ceremony was to take place; but a steady light beaming from one of the windows showed that the chapel was in readiness for it.
 "Thank God, we are not too late," said Norah, drawing a long sigh of relief.
 "By my faith, but I dinna think we are muckle ower sune," remarked Andrew. "If we had been kept another day in the cave the mischief wad have been done."
 "No," returned Norah. "I would still have prevented it. At whatever risk to myself, I would have saved Miss Kendal from so foul a wrong."
 "And probably fallen a sacrifice to Malvria's vengeance," said Hargreave.
 "It would have been in the cause of truth and virtue," sighed Noaah.
 "We must save you if we can, even now," observed Hargreave. "You will not appear unless it is absolutely necessary. I have some hopes that when the squire learns of Malvria's former marriage, that his pride will be touched, and his resentment roused because of the deception which has been practiced upon him. In that case he will himself forbid the union, and for the present at least, your existence will be unknown, and an opportunity given for your flight to some other place of safety."
 "If it wadn't for that old she-adder, sure the ruined castle is safe enough," remarked Terry.
 "It will suffice no longer as a place of refuge," rejoined the youth; "But another may be found."
 At this moment a small side door opened, and the light which streamed forth showed the figure of Paddy O'Flin, the priest's attendant.
 "God save ye, Paddy O'Flin," said Terry, stepping forward.
 "The top o' the evening to ye," responded Paddy; "but I don't know who you are at all, at all."
 "Oh, sure, never mind that," returned Terry. "It's not to be expected that a gentleman like you that has his reverence to wait upon and spate to should have time to know all the boys and colleens in the valley. But hearin' o' the grand marriage that is to be in the chapel to-night, we made bould to come up and see it."
 "Faix then ye've had a walk for just nothing," answered Paddy, "for not a soul uv ye can set a foot in the chapel this blessed night."
 "An' what's the hinder Paddy, avick," rejoined Terry. "Sure his reverence didn't used to be keepin' poor folks out av chapel."
 "Thru for it, and it's not his reverence at all, but Squire Kendal wants the marriage to be a private one, and he would be mighty displeas'd if he tu' any l'oy in the chapel, let alone the colleen that's wid you. So maybe you will be ather goin' away, fo I expect them over from the castle every mornin'."
 "In there not a dark corner in the chapel where we could remain quiet and not be seen?" asked Hargreave, stepping forward.
 "I am a stranger and I have taken a fancy to see the marriage at night. Of course I am willing to pay for the privilege, and here are two half-heard—the chink of the silver coin. "Sure now, there is a dark place at the far end of the chapel, where ye might keep quiet and nobody would see ye."

 The money was transferred to Paddy, and he at once led the way into the chapel, past the altar, to a seat behind two broad pillars, which supported the gallery. The only lights in the place being the two candles burning at the altar, this spot was cast into the deepest shadow, and had the party desired to be mere spectators of the ceremony, it might have taken place without their presence being suspected. But, of course, as the reader is aware, they had quite a different intention.
 Some minutes of perfect silence followed, then the sound of wheels was heard outside, and a vehicle stopped in front of the church, and the lights of the vehicle flashed in at the windows. Paddy O'Flin hurried out to meet the bridal party and carried them into the building by the great door, and a few minutes after he was gone a man strangely dressed in skin glided in, and stood with his back to one of the opposite pillars.
