ing his attention to the fact that matters were now once more as they had been at the beginning, but that he was as before willing to carry out the arrangements which he had already specified, provided that Ida should be permitted to consent to marry him. To this Mr. de la Molla, notwithstanding his grief and irritation at the course his would-be son-in-law had taken about the mortgages on the death of Mr. Quest, and the suspicion that he now had as to the original cause of his transfer to the lawyer, had answered courteously enough, saying what he had said before, that he could not force his daughter into a marriage with him, but that if she chose to agree with him he should offer no objection. And there the matter lay. Once or twice he had met Ida walking or driving. She had bowed to him coldly, and that was all. Indeed, he had only one crumb of comfort in his daily bread of disappointment, and that hope deferred which, where a lady is concerned, makes the heart more than normally sick, and that was, he knew his hated rival, Col. Quaritch, had been forbidden the castle, and that intercourse between him and Ida was practically at an end. But he was a dogged and persevering man, and he knew the power of money, and the alights to which people can be driven who are made desperate by the want of it. He knew, too, that it is no unusual thing for people who are attached to one means and themselves to another of their own free will, realizing that love will pass, but wealth, if the settlements are properly drawn, does not. Therefore, he had hoped that with so many circumstances bringing an ever increasing pressure upon her Ida's spirit would in time be broken, her resistance would collapse, and he would have his will. Nor, as the sequel will show, was that hope a baseless one.

As for his infatuation there was literally no limit to it. It broke out in all sorts of ways, and was for miles around a matter of public notoriety and gossip. Over the mantelpiece in his sitting-room was a fresh example of it. He had, by one means and another, obtained several photographs of Ida, notably one of her in a court dress, which she had worn two or three years before, when her brother James had insisted on her being presented. These photographs he had caused to be enlarged, and then had commissioned a well-known artist to paint from them a full length life size portrait of Ida in her court dress, at a cost of £2500. This order had been executed, and the portrait which, although, as might be expected, the coloring was not entirely satisfactory, was still an effective likeness, and a fine piece of work now hung in a splendid frame over his mantelpiece.

Hurst was about 21 years of age, unmarried, a stove mender, and residing with his parents at No. 1336 Chene street, Detroit.

A more horrible death has scarcely ever been the lot of a human being than that which overtook William Lowry, an aged colored resident of Marquette, on Sunday. He was found by a party of workmen in the forest near Oneta pinned to the ground by a tree which had fallen upon him. He had barely strength to speak to his rescuers and thank them. He said he had lain thus four days without food and tormented by insects. Portions of his body swarmed with maggots. He was brought to the city and died next morning from exposure and starvation, as the internal injuries sustained were not enough of themselves to be fatal.
